Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Maryland, I should like to say that there is more than one country in the world which produces coffee. We could buy our coffee from Brazil; we could buy some of it from some other South American countries; we could buy it from Java, Sumatra, and various other places; so that that commodity is open to trade. We can say, "We will buy your coffee if you buy our goods." We can say to Java, "We will buy your coffee if you take so much from America of our manufactured goods." We can say to the Straits Settlements, "We will buy so much rubber from you if you will buy our goods. If you will not, we will buy our rubber in Brazil, from where it originally came." With reference to any of the commodities which the Senator has mentioned, we can go to a given country and say to its people, "If you want to trade with us we will give you the preference on this trade, if in return you will buy the goods made in the United States."

Mr. TYDINGS. The only trouble with the Senator's logic is that the United States is already selling to these very countries more goods than they are buying from us.

Mr. KEAN. I know that we do not ship more to some of them than they ship to us. We do not ship more to Brazil than we buy from that country.

Mr. TYDINGS. What other countries in that category can the Senator name?

Mr. KEAN. We do not export as much to Java as we buy from Java.

Mr. TYDINGS. What is the other one? There are three countries in all the world that buy less from us than we sell to them; only three. So where is the Senator's argument, when already we are selling more to these countries than we are buying from them?

Mr. KEAN. Then we will take the three the Senator has mentioned.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maryland a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Maryland is correct in his position, then what are going to be the fruits that are coming from the proposed reciprocal trade agreements?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is very questionable, indeed.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, the State of New Jersey, which I have the honor in part to represent, is among the first great industrial centers of the United States. In extent it is not large, being fourth from the smallest State in the Union, but it ranks third in manufacturing on a basis of ratio of industrial production to area. A large number of the large industries of the United States have extensive plants in New Jersey. Originally attracted to the State by the water-power facilities and housing advantages, the later expansion of their number and size has been due to quick transportation connections. According to statistics compiled by the Federal Bureau of the Census from data collected in 1930, there are 8,364 manufacturing establishments in the State. In these establishments the number of salaried officers and employees, not including the number of employees of central administrative offices located elsewhere than at the factories, is 74,550. The average number of wage earners during the year the data was collected was 441,105. They were paid over $826,000,000 in salaries and wages. The value of the products was about $4,000,000,000. In the year 1927 there were 408,093 wage earners who worked on products valued at about $3,500,000,000. The 1930 census showed that the number of wage earners increased by 8 percent and the value of the products increased by 15 percent.

In addition to her industrial activities, New Jersey's agricultural products are substantially large for a State of her size. The approximate land area of the State is nearly 5,000,000 acres, of which about 2,000,000 acres are under cultivation. The value of the agricultural products in 1930 was nearly $84,000,000.

I submit, therefore, the power to destroy even the smallest of these industries for the benefit of some other industry should not be lodged in any one man, even though he may have the wisdom of Solomon.

LOANS BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS TO INDUSTRIES

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3487) relating to direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve banks, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. GLASS, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. WALCOTT, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the bill be printed showing the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

DR. REXFORD G. TUGWELL

Mr. CAPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, on May 30 and June 10, respectively, of 1933, I made some observations relative to Dr. Rexford G. Tugwell and discussed in some detail the subject matter of his book, issued May 8, 1933, under the title "The Industrial Discipline and the Governmental Acts", in which he renounced the Constitution of the United States, finding fault with the industrial group of our Nation as well as the organization heads of the labor unions of this country. I am glad to note that outstanding newspaper organizations, such as the Hearst group, are in support of the statement I presented to the Senate a year ago. I ask that an editorial of May 25, 1934, appearing in the Washington Herald, be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I should like to ask if the Senator will not amend his request and ask that the editorial be read at the desk?

Mr. HATFIELD. I should be very glad to have that done, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LONG. I ask to have the editorial read, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield for that purpose?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, May 15, 1934]

TUGWELLISM

Recently, as will be remembered, Dr. Wirt charged that the administration's "brain trust" was seeking, both furtively and openly, to bring about revolutionary changes in our form of government.

Denial was made that there was any basis for such charges.

Congress instituted an investigation, but changed the investigation as it proceeded into a farce, evidently desiring to protect the administration and to prevent Dr. Wirt from sustaining his charges.

Prof. Rexford G. Tugwell, however, as one member of the "brain trust", will hardly have the hardihood to deny what he has spoken in public or what he has written over his own signature.

And these public statements of Mr. Tugwell are infinitely more damaging, infinitely more communistic, and infinitely more subversive of American ideals than anything alleged by Dr. Wirt.

What can Mr. Tugwell say in denial or in defense of the following statement which he has publicly made:

"When a profession becomes so stiffly traditionalized as the economics of the past few decades nothing less than a revolution is required to shake its faith and teaching."

When a paragraph like this is read, in the light of the admitted failure of the A.A.A. and the N.R.A., one wonders whether traditionalized economic science is really so worthless after all.

The confused outlook of the new deal and the admitted breakdown of much that it has attempted seem to be confirming the principles of established economics, deride them as one may.

Exactly what does Professor Tugwell mean by his sensational advocacy of "nothing less than a revolution"?

And what does he mean by his declaration on page 1 of the same book that "There is revolution in our midst"?

Professor Tugwell now denies that he is concerned with the stoppage of the flow of capital into productive enterprise.

Apparently he has become aware of the growing revolt against arbitrary price control.

But in his book, Industry's Coming of Age, Professor Tugwell shows clearly that he is in favor of the control of capital expenditure and also of price control.

He says specifically in this volume:

"There are two obvious functions which some public body will always have to perform if social results are to be got. One is the matter of capital dispersal and allocation; the other is that of price control."

Professor Tugwell may be a Tory, as he somewhat disingenuously described himself in his recent speech before the country's editors in Washington, but his Toryism seems to have a very Russian tinge.

Take, for instance, the following quotations, still from his book above referred to. On page 261 he says:

"Perhaps it can be made to seem wrong to squander wealth, and perhaps it can be made to seem supremely important to produce it. But neither in our popular morality, with its roots in a past age and its controls devised for a medieval economy; in religion which clings to outworn ethics, irrelevant for the present, nor in public-school education, which is dominated by the two, does there seem to be a sufficient promise. But it is through some social agencies as these that controls will have to come."

And if anyone still thinks that the new deal is aiming at recovery merely and not at fundamental changes in our life, let him ponder the following by Tugwell:

"These trends are so important that, unless I am utterly mistaken, they will result in an almost complete remaking of American economic life. In the clear view of them which is emerging all the plans for our future must be made."

Will Professor Tugwell explain, if he can, the enunciation of such revolutionary doctrine, so subversive of our American policies and ideals?

Will he explain his indictment of our churches and our schools—his arraignment of the politics and economics, and even the morality of our people?

Is everything wrong with our American people?

Are only Professor Tugwell and his communistic comrades right?

Does Professor Tugwell's revolution necessitate the rejection, the destruction of every American principle, of every American institution, of every American moral code and intellectual standard?

Treason to American principles is revolution, and Mr. Tugwell's call to revolution is treason to American principles and to the American people.

Dr. Wirt charges as much.

His accusations were hardly needed.

From their own mouths the "brain trust" stand not only accused but convicted.

Why should not the committee of Congress reassemble and ask Professor Tugwell about these treasonable statements with which his writings are strewn and littered?

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE FOR CITIZENS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I had cherished the hope at the beginning of the Seventy-third Congress that opportunity would be afforded for consideration and action upon a matter of major importance to the people of the District of Columbia. However, the pressure of urgent national legislation has prevented.

The question to which I refer is embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 9, which it was my privilege to introduce early in the first session of the present Congress. This resolution proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, empowering Congress to grant unto the residents of the District of Columbia voting representation in the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the electoral college and the same rights in respect to access to the courts of the United States as possessed by citizens of a State.

Mr. President, there is no matter affecting the National Capital community which is of as vital importance to the half million inhabitants of the District of Columbia as this proposal, whether viewed from either a local or a national angle. Here at the very heart of our great Republic we have a most anomalous condition—a great intelligent community of patriotic Americans deprived of all representation and participation in their Government, both local and National, though privileged to bear the burdens of taxation and all other obligations of citizenship. It has always seemed to me to be the very height of inconsistency for Congress, representing the world's great representative Republic, to maintain at the seat of government, under its exclusive control, such a glaring violation of the theory of republican government.

The District of Columbia, according to the 1930 United States census, has a population of 486,869, which is greater than that of eight of the sovereign States of the Union—New Hampshire, Idaho, Arizona, New Mexico, Vermont, Delaware, Wyoming, and Nevada. The District's population exceeds that of Delaware and Wyoming combined, Delaware and Nevada combined, Wyoming and Nevada combined, and Vermont and Nevada combined. Each of these combinations is represented in the Senate by 4 Senators and in the House of Representatives by 2 Representatives, while the District of Columbia has no representation in either body.

With a population of persons of voting age of 341,465, the District exceeds the population of voting age of 10 of the States. The good people of our country do not understand these facts regarding the District of Columbia or that these unrepresented Americans bear all of the burdens which are borne by all other national Americans.

The people of the District of Columbia pay both local and national taxes just as do the people in the States. For the fiscal year 1933 the District residents paid in Federal income and miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes an amount greater than that paid by each of 25 of the States and more than the combined payments of 10 States.

Mr. President, among many erroneous impressions regarding the District of Columbia is the idea that most of the residents here are Government employees and hold a voting residence back in the States. Nothing is further from the truth. In the first place, those engaged in gainful employment outside the Government far exceed in number the Federal employees, and, secondly, the number possessing and exercising the voting privilege is comparatively small. During the 1930 census enumeration a special questionnaire was used to ascertain just what this local voting strength was. The result reported by the Census Bureau is that there were found 15,105 in the District having a voting residence in the States which they had recently exercised. While the accuracy or adequacy of these figures has been challenged by the local political groups, the most extravagant and unreasonable claims cannot raise the number with power to vote in the States above 80,000. If from the population of voting age in the States and the District is first deducted the number of unnaturalized foreigners and there be a further deduction in the case of the District, the extravagant estimate of 80,000, the District is still found to possess a potential voting strength of 251,439, which is greater than that of each of 10 States.

Whether measured by the standard of population, payment of national taxes, service in war or peace, or the bearing of any national burdens, the District is to be found shoulder to shoulder with the States of the Union, and in per capita measurement is among the leaders. This showing is one clearly indicating that in every respect these people are as justly entitled to the full rights and privileges of representative government as any people under the Stars and Stripes.

The Congress seems to have considerable difficulty in legislating for this smallest in area of our American community subdivisions, and I believe this is largely due to the un-American conditions which prevail here contrary to the fundamental principles of our Government. There has been considerable discussion of plans for reorganizing the local government of the District of Columbia and the changing of its form, but these are matters for future consideration and there seem to be the widest differences of opinion as to the lines such reforms shall take.

Based upon sound fundamental American principles, there seems to be no room for a difference of opinion as to the necessity as well as the absolute justice of granting the right of voting representation to these, our fellow Americans, in the National Government which legislates for them, both locally and nationally, which taxes them and sends them to war.

Mr. President, in 1922 the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia submitted to the Senate in the Sixty-seventh Congress a very comprehensive favorable report upon this proposal. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a summary of the conclusions reached by that committee.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY

Summarizing, we find and report:

The proposed constitutional amendment does not reduce the power of Congress in respect to the Capital but adds a new power; it does not propose the admission of the District into the Union as a sovereign State; it does not propose the destruction of the "10 miles square" provision of the Constitution; it does not lessen in the smallest degree the control by the Nation through Congress of what remains of the "10 miles square"; it does not disturb in any way the financial relation of Nation and Capital; it is not based upon either the abolition or retention of the half-and-half law; it does not propose or involve changes in the municipal government of the District.

It plans to bestow upon the 437,000 [now nearly 500,000] Americans of the District a distinctive basic right of the American citizen—in a government of the people, by the people, for the people—in a government which roots its justice in consent of the governed—in a representative government which inseparably couples taxation and arms bearing as a soldier with representation.

This distinctive American privilege decorates the American with a badge of honor and arms him with power. Its lack slurs the Washingtonian as unfit and defective, and slurs the Nation as in this respect un-American and impotent.

What the amendment proposes is equitable in itself and compulsory in accordance with American principles and traditions.

It gives to residents of the District rights and privileges which, under our scheme of government, belong to all who pay national taxes and fight as national soldiers.

It gives to residents of the District a self-protecting power in the national councils which is denied to the resident of no other community in all of the mainland and contiguous United States from Maine to Texas and from New York to California.

In the matter of access to the Federal courts, it raises District residents from a lower plane than that of aliens to the status of citizens of a State.

National representation of the District will remove from the Nation the shame of impotency.

It will proclaim to the world that the great Republic is as devoted to the principles of representative government and as capable of enforcing them as other republics with capitals in nation-controlled districts, like Mexico, Brazil, and Argentina. These nations have not found themselves impotent to give full national representation to the people of their capitals.

It will proclaim to the world that the people of Washington are as fit to participate in national representative government as the people of Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Aires, and Mexico City. Washington will cease to be the only capital in all the world whose people, slurred as tainted or defective, are unworthy to enjoy the same national representation as that enjoyed by all other cities of the Nation.

Washington will cease to be the only American community—numerous, intelligent, prosperous, public spirited, and patriotic—in all the expanse of continental and contiguous United States whose fitness to exercise national privileges as well as to bear national burdens is denied.

National representation will clothe the Washingtonian with a vital American privilege to which he is undeniably in equity entitled; will cleanse him of the stigma and stain of un-Americanism; and, curing his political impotency, will arm him with a certain power.

It will relieve the Nation of the shame of un-Americanism at its heart and of impotency to cure this evil.

It will inflict no injury or hardship upon either Nation or Capital to counteract these benefits.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, it will be my purpose to reintroduce this joint resolution in the Seventy-fourth Congress and to urge favorable consideration and action thereon.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator intend to speak on the Colombian Treaty?

Mr. HATFIELD. That is my purpose.

Mr. LONG. In justice to my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and others, I ask that I be allowed to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HATFIELD. Very well.

Mr. LONG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Cutting	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Davis	Keyes	Russell
Bachman	Dickinson	King	Schall
Bailey	Dieterich	Lewis	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dill	Logan	Shipstead
Barbour	Duffy	Lonergan	Smith
Barkley	Erickson	Long	Steiwer
Black	Fess	McCarran	Stephens
Bone	Fletcher	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Brown	George	McNary	Thompson
Bulkley	Gibson	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulow	Glass	Murphy	Tydings
Byrd	Goldsborough	Neely	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Gore	Norbeck	Van Nuys
Capper	Hale	Norris	Wagner
Caraway	Harrison	O'Mahoney	Walcott
Carey	Hastings	Overton	Walsh
Clark	Hatch	Patterson	Wheeler
Connally	Hatfield	Pittman	White
Copeland	Hayden	Pope
Costigan	Hebert	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the able senior Senator from Mississippi.

On May 22 I offered a resolution, which I will read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is requested to transmit immediately to the Senate a copy of the reciprocal trade agreement between the Governments of the United States and Colombia, agreed upon and signed on December 15, 1933, relating to certain import duties, excise taxes, and prohibitions on importation affecting specified products of such countries.

May I ask the able Senator whether or not he is willing to have the Senate consider my resolution at this time?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am quite sure the very courteous and able Senator from West Virginia would not want to delay the consideration of the very important bill which is now before us, and which probably is the key to the adjournment of Congress, by the consideration of another resolution. As soon as this bill is out of the way I am quite sure he will have no difficulty in having his resolution considered.

Does that answer the Senator?

Mr. HATFIELD. But does not the Senator feel that it would aid this body very materially to have that treaty before it during the pendency of this measure?

Mr. HARRISON. I am afraid it might provoke more discussion and might delay the conclusion of this measure.

Mr. HATFIELD. May I ask the able Senator whether or not he has any communication from the Secretary of State respecting the resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. Let me ask the Senator from West Virginia a question.

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the Senator please answer my question?

Mr. HARRISON. I shall answer it in a moment, but I desire to ask the Senator a question first.

If the Senator is so anxious with reference to the Colombian agreement's being published or sent to the Senate, would he be willing, if consent should be given to have the treaty sent here, to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate, starting tomorrow at 12 o'clock, to 15 minutes on each amendment and, say, 15 minutes on the bill?

Mr. HATFIELD. That would depend largely upon the subject matter found in the treaty. I think I could answer the question more intelligently and more convincingly from my viewpoint if I knew the substance of the Colombian Treaty.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the Senator fearful about in connection with the Colombian Treaty?

Mr. HATFIELD. There are a good many things of which I could be fearful as contained in this treaty.

Mr. HARRISON. What has the Senator in mind?

Mr. HATFIELD. I see no very great hurry in agreeing upon a limitation of debate on this bill, when we take into consideration the fact that the bill now before this body involves all the tariff schedules found in the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, and it took the Senate of the United States something over 7 months to consider that legislation. It required a great many speeches and a large amount of discussion; and finally, after 7 months, the tariff law of 1930 was voted upon and enacted. Now we are asked within a period of a week or 10 days to act on this important measure, at this time in our country's economic history when our industries need protection more than they needed it when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was under consideration by this body, and when we have 10,000,000 workers unemployed.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUTTING. I desire to point out to the Senator a little of the testimony given before the Senate Finance Committee which may be pertinent to the subject of discussion.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] had been asking a number of very pointed questions of the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Sayre. The Senator from Connecticut finally ended by saying—page 76 of the hearing:

Can you think of any trade that would benefit this country that does not injure another industry, under the terms of this bill?

And the reply of the Assistant Secretary of State was as follows:

I think, sir—I hesitate to mention this—but I think, sir, the very recent agreement which we signed with Colombia will create real benefits without doing injury to anybody.

If the treaty with Colombia furnishes the only instance of a real benefit which the Assistant Secretary of State could think of with regard to this bill, ought we not to have that treaty before us in order to know what we are actually voting on?

Mr. HATFIELD. Absolutely, Mr. President; and that was the purpose of my resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator again what there is in the Colombian Treaty that he is fearful of?

Mr. HATFIELD. I have not seen it. I can only answer the distinguished Senator from Mississippi by conjecture, or by an intuitive conclusion. I may say to the able Senator that coffee, oil, and fruits from the Republic of Colombia represent some 85 or 90 percent of the entire exports of Colombia to this country.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not want to tax coffee coming into the United States, does he?

Mr. HATFIELD. Not at all; and I do not quite understand how coffee enters into this picture at all.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator to mention coffee. That is why I asked the question.

Mr. HATFIELD. I mentioned it in the course of mentioning other items which make up the imports to this country from the Republic of Colombia.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator, with reference to the Colombian agreement, that I am quite sure no one, whether he opposes this bill or advocates it, will find any cause to complain so far as the United States is concerned in connection with the Colombian agreement; and I am quite sure the Assistant Secretary of State, in his testimony before the committee, was correct in saying that it will be of very marked advantage to the United States and will injuriously affect no industry in this country.

If I may continue for just a moment, while I do not want to prolong the Senator's speech, I wish to state that the State Department did conclude this agreement and under the rules, of course these agreements are made public in each country simultaneously. We are trying to work out some other arrangements; and the advantages that would accrue to the United States by virtue of the Colombian agreement ought also to be obtained from some other countries with which we may negotiate.

There is one other great country with which we have large trade in one of the articles covered in the Colombian agreement, which, I may say, comes in free of duty, and which I may say the Senator says he is not in favor of taxing and which gives us very large advantage by virtue of the fact we say we are not going to tax it. Some of these other countries, especially one large country, has with us a treaty which includes provision for full favored-nation rights. If the Colombian treaty shall be concluded, this other country can have the same advantages under the favored-nation clause.

It would be much more advantageous for the United States if, before the Colombian agreement shall be concluded, instead of making it public and frustrating the whole plan, we could work out an agreement with this other country which would be just as advantageous to the United States, which might mean more markets abroad, without giving up anything on our part except that we would agree not to tax certain articles. So it seems to me as if the State Department has acted very wisely in proceeding as it has proceeded. The Department is not trying to keep anything secret. If it shall be held back until after this legislation shall have passed, every interest affected in the United States will have a right to be heard, under the terms of the pending bill. So we can lose nothing by it. That is just about the situation.

I have no objection to the agreement being made public if the Colombian Government wants it to be made public. I would not like to see it thrown into the Senate merely to be utilized as a vehicle for debate, in order to delay the consideration of the pending bill.

Before I take my seat, may I say that I am sure that no charge can be brought by the Senator from West Virginia, or by anyone else on the other side, that in this debate extreme patience has not been manifested and displayed by those of us in charge of the proposed legislation. There has been no attempt, and there will be no attempt, to curtail legitimate discussion of the provisions of the bill. I have seen no evidence of filibuster. If evidence of a filibuster shall appear, then there will be evidence upon this side of an effort to check the filibuster, because this legislation is going to be passed, and those who participate in trying to delay it are just putting off the adjournment of Congress that much longer.

Of course, there may be some here who want Congress to stay in session throughout the summer; as is suggested to me by a Senator sitting near me, some may be afraid to go home. [Laughter.] However, I think the average Senator wants to transact the public business, to carry out the legislative program, and to adjourn the Congress as quickly as possible. So far as I am concerned, I think it would be welcome news to everyone if we could finish the program in a rational way, without any bitterness being displayed, without any anger being manifested, without any undue and unnecessary delay being foisted upon the Senate, so that the country might breathe, and those of us—and I include all in that category—who have worked here for many months now as I have never seen the Membership of a Congress work in my experience, could go home and get some rest.

I have said more than I had intended to say. I am sorry I have delayed the consideration of the bill as much as I have, and I hope that the Senator, after he shall have concluded, will permit us to proceed to consider the amendments.

I may say, whether I am right or wrong, that there are certain responsibilities which rest upon those of us who are in charge of the legislation, and I shall be forced to try to hold the Congress in session, even tonight, and tomorrow, and tomorrow night, unless some kind of an arrangement can be made which will speed along the legislation.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I appreciate the genial attitude of the Senator from Mississippi, and I assure him that I am just as anxious to see this session of the Congress adjourn as he is. I assure him, further, that I am one Senator who is not afraid to go back home. I may further say to him that I go back home anywhere from two to three times a month, and I am sorry that I cannot stay at home when I get there.

Mr. VANDENBERG rose.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New Mexico first, then I will yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that I did not have him in mind.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thoroughly understand that from my good friend the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I was just wondering, after listening to the lucid account by the able Senator from Mississippi of the reasons which actuated the administration with regard to the Colombian treaty at this time, whether the Senator would consider that that was an example of the Wilsonian doctrine of "open covenants openly arrived at."

Mr. HATFIELD. I think I could answer that without consulting the Senator from Mississippi, that the former President of the United States, that distinguished American, Woodrow Wilson, would not stand for that kind of political tactics for one moment.

I now yield to the able Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Mississippi for just a moment, may I ask him a question? He used the words "trade agreement" and "treaty" rather indiscriminately in his discussion of this Colombian proposition. Is it fair to inquire whether it is a treaty or a trade agreement?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a trade agreement.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is not a treaty?

Mr. HARRISON. It is not a treaty. As I stated, I was not informed the other day when a similar question was asked, but I understand now that it is a trade agreement, and that the Executive has the right to make it, because it is a question which affects articles on the free list and does not affect those on the dutiable list.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator made the statement in the same connection that under the terms of the bargaining bill any affected interest will be given a chance to be heard before the thing is finally consummated. Am I correct in quoting the Senator?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. I may say that I am merely giving my opinion about this, not having read the trade agreement, but I know, in a way, what is in it, because I have made some inquiry about it since the question came up.

If this legislation should pass, and the Colombian agreement shall not have been concluded before it shall have passed, then it would seem to me that the proposed agreement would then come under the provisions of the pending bill, perhaps, and the spirit and purpose of the legislation be carried out by interested parties being given the right to be heard, if there are any parties who are interested in the matter. I really do not think it affects any industry in this country. I think it is more of an agreement which affects the American people, in that we are agreeing not to put a tax upon a certain article which comes in free of duty now.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This is what I am trying to get at, if the Senator will indulge me: This agreement was concluded and signed on the 15th day of December. What I want to know is whether this is a sample of the type of hearings covered under the terms of that section of the pending bill which pretends to promise hearings to affected industries, namely, hearings after a reciprocal trade agreement has been signed and concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, no; of course it is not.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is precisely what will happen in this case.

Mr. HARRISON. There is an agreement which has been practically concluded.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Exactly.

Mr. HARRISON. Concluded, as I understand it, some months ago, but never made public, and I imagine that it will not be in operation until it shall have been promulgated by both countries.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What good is a hearing under those circumstances?

Mr. HARRISON. Under this agreement, may I say, as I have said, there is no interest that is affected except the American people, who might be taxed on coffee, which we are agreeing not to tax, and which the Senator does not want to tax, does he?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. In the main, they agree to take certain commodities from this country. I do not know whom we could call in under those circumstances, unless we called in all the American people.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Senator now disclosed the full contents of the treaty?

Mr. HARRISON. I have not; I am just speaking generally about it. I will say to the Senator, however, that I think we could pass a resolution here pretty quickly, if we could proceed along without any evidence of a filibuster, and limit debate in a rational way, so that we could come to some conclusion on this matter.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am very earnestly seeking information at the moment and with no intention of holding up anything.

Mr. HARRISON. I can appreciate that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The industry and agriculture of this country has been assured that the amendments introduced into this bill by the Senate Finance Committee providing for hearings is a saving clause which will permit an ample exploration of any objections that industry or agriculture may have to one of these agreements. Here is an agreement which the Senator says will be submitted to this type of exploration.

Mr. HARRISON. This agreement does not come within the provisions of the pending bill at all. It is a separate matter that the President has negotiated. It is not provided for in this bill. The bill at that time had not been written, had not been submitted at all, because this agreement was made in December, as I understand. But what I said to the Senator was that if the agreement is not finally concluded until after we shall have passed this legislation, that if the President does bring it under this law, interested persons might be heard. But the agreement was not included under this bill at all.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President; but in the announcement of the State Department it is clearly declared that it will come into force only after necessary action has been taken. Therefore, this pending Colombian agreement is clearly within the implications and purposes of the pending legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. If it is, as I said, the spirit of this legislation ought to be carried out; and one of the provisions of this legislation is that there shall be notice given and that interested parties may be heard under such rules and regulations as prescribed by the President.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Exactly. What I want to know from the Senator is whether this is typical of the kind of hearings that are to be had hereafter; if we are to have hearings after the agreement not only has been concluded but has been signed by both parties to it? I want to know whether that is the kind of hearings which are to be given under this bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Why, of course not. It is not in contemplation. I should dislike very much to see it. I have more confidence in the President than that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is the only kind of hearing that can be given under this agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. I know, but this agreement has been written since December, as I understand. Does the Senator from West Virginia want to ask me some more questions?

Mr. HATFIELD. Yes, Mr. President. The information respecting this treaty is in the possession of the Secretary of State and in the possession of the President of the United States. Now that we are going to have secret reciprocal treaties dealing with trade propositions, why could not the Secretary of State and the Chief Executive of this Nation take the Senate into their confidence, and in secret session give to the Senate the substance of this treaty?

Mr. HARRISON. The State Department has no objection to this treaty being made public. They have already sounded out the Government of Colombia with respect thereto.

Mr. HATFIELD. Does the Senator take the position that the Secretary of State would be making the treaty public if he were to turn it over to the Senate of the United States in secret executive session?

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think that if this treaty were to be made public and the Senator knew everything that was in it, the consideration of this tariff legislation would be expedited thereby?

Mr. HATFIELD. I believe so.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator say that he would stop talking if the State Department were to make it public?

Mr. HATFIELD. In response to that inquiry on the part of the able Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. HARRISON. Do not carry the idea that I want the Senator to stop talking.

Mr. HATFIELD. I do not misunderstand the Senator from Mississippi at all. I represent a State, as does the Senator from Mississippi. That State has certain interests involved in any tariff legislation which comes before this body. The Senator is interested in long-staple cotton; he is interested in turpentine; he is interested in a great many industrial products.

The Senator from West Virginia is likewise interested in some of the very products in which the Senator from Mississippi is interested, and the reason that the Senator from West Virginia has been discussing this legislation is due to the fact that it is foreign to the policy of our country in administering tariff rates, and of course the people of West Virginia are very much concerned as to how much protection they will have, and how well they will be protected. They have the conviction, Mr. President, that the Representatives in the House of Representatives from the State of West Virgina and the representatives in the Senate from the State of West Virginia are better informed and know more about how to protect the industries of the State of West Virginia than the President of the United States or any individual or group of individuals that the President of the United States may designate to fix rates, with the idea of either protecting the industries of my State or protecting the industries of any other State.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that I admire his convictions. I know he is a protectionist, and he does not have to apologize about his convictions on the subject. I am quite sure that there is no one here who is in favor of higher tariff duties than the Senator from West Virginia. I have no fault to find with him on that.

Mr. HATFIELD. I cannot agree with the Senator there. I do not believe in embargoes. I do believe in reasonable tariff rates.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator is honest in that conviction, and when I asked him whether, if this treaty should be made public, or if he should be informed about all the terms of the treaty, he would then we willing to have an agreement limiting debate, I did not mean that he should not speak on any amendments as they came up. I listened to the Senator the other day for quite a long time. He made a very elaborate and a very illuminating speech. I thought he had exhausted the subject.

Mr. HATFIELD. Does the Senator agree with it?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not agree with the Senator's speech, as I do not agree with much in which the Senator believes, but at least it was a long speech, and it was an elaborate speech, and I thought that the Senator had concluded, and I was hopeful that we might——

Mr. HATFIELD. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I am not going to make a speech this evening. It is my purpose, if I have the opportunity, to discuss the chemical industry as it presents itself in the State of West Virginia. But that will not be a long, drawn-out address. It certainly will not be as long as the chemical address that I delivered here in 1930, at which time I had the able support and the very great friendship of the Senator from Mississippi, which I appreciated, and which made possible the protection of the chemical industry not only in West Virginia but throughout this country.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, if it is half as long as that speech we might get through here at the end of next week.

Mr. HATFIELD. It is not half as long, may I say to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. President, I take it that we are denied the opportunity to be taken into the confidence of the executive department of our Government upon this treaty between the United States and the Republic of Colombia.

A majority of the Congress of the United States has not hesitated to trust the President of the United States with practically everything, industrially speaking, monetarily speaking, which ordinarily belongs to the Congress of the United States, and it seems to me a small matter indeed when a Senator or a group of Senators ask for the substance of a treaty which has been negotiated and which was signed, according to the press-release reports, December 15, 1933, and all that remains to put it into operation is the passage of the pending bill which will give authority to the President of the United States and not the Senate of the United States to approve or to ratify this treaty.

I submit, Mr. President, that when the Congress of the United States passes this bill by a majority vote, giving the President the power to ratify an instrument which now requires the votes of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, that is going a long way in the direction of disintegration of the fundamental principles of the Government of the United States, which is supposedly protected by the Constitution.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I was called away from the Chamber on some business and have just been able to return. I want to find out from the Senator what happened as the result of the Senator's discussion with the Senator from Mississippi about the treaty with Colombia. Has any enlightenment been spread on that matter in my absence?

Mr. HATFIELD. I have not received any. I may be a little bit dense upon the subject, but up to the present time I have not received any light upon the subject as to what is in the treaty, I will say to the able Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. What information did the Senator glean with respect to that matter while I was away? Did the Senator from Mississippi look as if he would do anything more with respect to the matter than he had done, and, if so, did he say he would let us in on the matter?

Mr. HATFIELD. Well, the Senator from Mississippi talked knowingly about it.

Mr. LONG. He talked as if he knew something about it?

Mr. HATFIELD. He talked as if he knew something about it, but he did not take us very far into his confidence, Mr. President.

Mr. LONG. I was hopeful that before the Senator from Mississippi decides to sit up all night here, keeping us in the dark, that he will just let a little light shine in here, and that light might save some of this night business. In other words, it seems to me that "midnight" is the kind of policy we have with respect to this tariff bill. Senators insist on putting some nighttime on it. They put everybody in the dark. I understand that one Senator from the West has been smiling because of his belief that he has gotten himself in the clear, and they are not going to bother him; but, on the other hand, I understand from the sub-rosa movement that his crowd is the first one which is going to get the ax.

This treaty with Colombia seems to throw an air of mystery about the proceedings. In other words, we can legislate a whole lot quicker if we know what we are legislating on. It is very hard to make men get up and vote when they do not know but they may be sentencing themselves to death; and if we knew what we were voting on and just what particular situation we were developing, it would be better.

I have not the same information on that treaty, of course, that other Senators have, and I may be incorrect; but I read a news article this morning, which I loaned to my friend from Ohio, and, if the Senator from West Virginia will pardon me, I will read just an excerpt from that article. Here is a statement about this treaty which appeared in yesterday afternoon's Washington Times, May 24, on page 3, column 1:

VOTE ON TARIFF HELD BY FIGHT ON TREATY

By William K. Hutchinson

A Republican drive to force publication of a new commercial treaty with Colombia served today to block Senate action on the administration bill conferring broad tariff powers on the President.

The Republicans charged that terms of the treaty negotiated last December would prove that the administration is planning to sacrifice certain American industries in order to expand America's foreign trade.

NEGOTIATED SECRETLY

They demanded adoption of a resolution by Senator HATFIELD (R.), of West Virginia, directing the State Department to send the treaty to the Senate.

The treaty was negotiated secretly and has been held in confidence. The administration originally intended to present it to the Senate for ratification; but if the new tariff bill is enacted, it will be revised into a reciprocal trade agreement and put into effect without Senate concurrence.

International News Service learned that the United States and Colombia agreed first to place no export taxes on products exported to each other.

In other words, the beef we have now coming in from Uruguay and the Argentine will be exported from Colombia into America a great deal easier.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, of course, under the Constitution America cannot impose an export tax, but I understand the Republic of Colombia does impose such a tax.

Mr. LONG. Yes. I read further:

They also agreed to reduce import duties or tariffs on their imports from each other.

MELLONS BIG BENEFICIARIES

The largest importers into the United States from Colombia are the Gulf Oil Co. and the United Fruit Co.

I stop reading long enough to say that I understand a gentleman whose name is Victor Cutter, who was president of the United Fruit Co., has been down here lobbying considerably for this bill to be passed. I received the information on a number of occasions that the United Fruit Co. is very anxious to have this trade agreement consummated and to have this bill passed. Mr. President, if the United Fruit Co. had its way, it would have no other fruits sold in this country except tropical fruits. Every time it brings a shipload of fruit from a foreign country it means that some apple merchant or some orange merchant or some lemon merchant or other fruit merchant or planter or farmer loses that much business.

I will read a little further:

The family of Andrew W. Mellon, former Republican Secretary of the Treasury, controls the Gulf Oil Co., while Victor Cutter, influential Republican in Boston, is the former head of the United Fruit Co.

What is happening is this: They are hacking us here with a two-edged sword. The Republican patriots in the United Fruit Co. and the Democratic patriots in the International Mercantile Marine are both advocating that we drop partisanism and give the United Fruit Co. and the big packing houses and, on top of that, the big oil companies, the right to bring into the United States everything they desire from the South American countries; that we should have no tariffs and should let the poor farmers' wool go down 35 percent more, as it already has since this bill was brought in here, and let the beef—to raise the price of which we have appropriated $150,000,000—spoil on the counters of the country, because of the beef of the Argentine and Uruguay which is being imported into the United States right now.

If the Senator will pardon me for taking up so much time, I will read further from the article:

Senate leaders were informed the treaty called for a reduction of the tariff on oil and fruits.

"Oil and fruits!" Why, certainly. Let them bring their fruits in here. We raise oranges in Louisiana, but we cannot compete with them with the kind of labor they have down there. Then let them bring their oils in, their vegetable oils, their tropical oils; and let them bring in various other products. We cannot compete with them. I read further:

With a pledge against imposing any tariffs on coffee or bananas.

We do not have any tariff against bananas, so far as I know; but, Mr. President, this is one of the few times in the history of this country when the United States Senate has been called upon to legislate in an atmosphere of mysticism and crypticism. We are today importing from Colombia and from Uruguay and from Venezuela products into this country that are penalizing and destroying the business of the American farmer, and we are told that a treaty has been made with the Republic of Colombia, that something else has been cooked up, signed, sealed, and delivered, and they do not dare let the United States Senate have it, because they do not want us to know for whom they have the ax sharpened. They are today telling Senators—big, grown-up, 21-year-old men, supposed to be legislating for the benefit of the American people, supposed to be charged with the duty of ratifying treaties—and boldly and openly telling them that they are not going to let them see what is in that treaty until they get the pending bill across. It makes us look like children; I should say "stepchildren." The idea of the Senate being denied the opportunity to know what is in a treaty or trade agreement under which somebody has got to lose business, under which, perhaps, some poor man interested in cottonseed has got to lose what business he now has in cottonseed oil. Yet they say, "We have got the thing all signed, sealed, and delivered, and we are not going to let you have that treaty." Where is that treaty? What is in that treaty?

Who was at the anointing when they were signing up this royal document that is not to be seen by the common herd that sits in the United States Senate and that ordinarily would pass upon the validity of that thing? Why can we not get that treaty? I should like to know what there is under the barrel. What has been cooked up for us? Who is going to get the first taste of the knife that is being sharpened to cut the American people's throat? Who is going to get the first trip to the block?

Let us find out how we are going to start the guillotine going. Who is first going to go under the knife? Apparently whoever is covered by this treaty with Colombia. That will give some indication. Instead of having all this hidden mystery, when the Senator from Mississippi very patriotically agrees to do what is requested, we will have as little of the atmosphere of confusion as possible. Why not sweep away this mist of misunderstanding so far as we can and bring that Colombian Treaty in here for the visa of the United States Senate. That is what we want to know. Let us have all this confusion swept away. Let us remove the cause for it. Let us know what is under the barrel. Let us know what is cooked up. Let us know what we are going to be expected to swallow so far as we can.

I would go a little bit farther. I understand that they are already negotiating a large number of other treaties. These "brain trusters" have their pencils all sharpened—these little, low-ceiling fellows with bifocal glasses over their eyes—and are mapping out more of these interchanges and exchanges than have ever been heard of. I would go farther. I would attempt to obtain information up to date as to what has been done about these negotiations. I think we should be entitled to that; but, at least, there ought to be no hesitation in bringing that treaty in here.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the failure of the State Department to place this treaty with Colombia before the Senate of the United States, because of the refusal of the Colombian Government officials to permit the Congress of the United States to see this treaty, is the most humiliating and most abject act I have ever heard of in the history of our Government.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, let me correct the Senator. That is not the reason. They found out another reason. I can state to the Senator that I reliably know that the State Department does not now contend that the reason they do not give us that treaty is because Colombia does not want us to have it; that is not the ground upon which the State Department, so I am informed, is refusing us that treaty. It is on the ground that they do not think it is to the public interest that we know it. That is the ground, not that Colombia is refusing it, but on the ground that it is not best that we know. In other words, "it is not meet you know how Caesar lov'd you", as we will remember, for you would be infuriated to sudden mob action, or something of that kind. In other words, the Secretary of State does not want the people of Louisiana to find out how much he loves them, because the last time he expressed any love for us he did not hold the ax behind his back; he had it right square over our heads, and it took some good hard work to get it away from there; but this time these loving professions are in this hidden document, and I should like to have such affection displayed as that in the open Senate, so we might review the document. The reason he will give—I will stake my reputation on it—will be that he does not think that we ought to know all, not because Colombia has declined to give its consent, but because he does not think it is best that the public be allowed to have the knowledge of what he has got in the treaty because of other arrangements he has in hand. That is the reason.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it seems hardly possible, and yet, there is no other construction that can be placed upon the act of the State Department in permitting a foreign government to dictate to this Government and to the Congress of the United States, as has been done in the refusal of the State Department to lay this treaty before the Senate at this time, than that we admit our fear of Colombia, or that there is something contained in the treaty which the administration is afraid to disclose.

To my mind, the American people will question the Americanism of those Senators who will accept the dictation of a foreign government which, having entered into a treaty with the United States, now publicly states that the Senate of the United States shall not function.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States, in abdicating its powers and responsibilities under the Constitution, has apparently indicated to the appointed officers of our Government and to representatives of foreign nations our lack of courage and lack of Americanism.

Unless there is contained in the treaty some promise on the part of representatives of the State Department that the Senate could not endorse or ratify, why the secrecy?

Yet, Mr. President, I want to be fair. The reason, direct or implied, given by the State Department for the failure to present the treaty to the Senate warrants the belief that the State Department has bowed to the dictation of the officials of the Colombian Government. However, it is quite possible that the arbitrary and most unusual action of the officials of the Colombian Government has been inspired by those Americans holding valuable concessions in Colombia and who succeeded, seeking their own enrichment, in securing favors through this treaty that the Senate or the American people would not endorse or ratify.

Mr. President, there is a great hue and cry over our land on the part of many asking for the early adjournment of Congress. Is there any wonder that the Senate of the United States is held in such low esteem by the American people when the leaders of the Senate permit a foreign power to dictate as to when and how we may carry out our constitutional obligations?

A few years ago those who now have the honor of representing the majority party in this body clamored long and loud for open public consideration of all treaties and all confirmations of public officials?

Why the change?

What is there in this treaty to conceal?

This is the place for its consideration, and because of that fact it should be dealt with openly and in public.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BONE in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is now discussing the one item in the whole procedure that was called to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] last Monday, when he asked whether we on this side of the Chamber would agree that such proceedings should be public, insinuating his belief that they ought not to be public. His statement was, referring to the proceedings leading up to the treaty or agreement:

> Does the Senator take the position that such hearings as may be had should be public?

My answer was:

> I should think so.

> Why does the Senator distinguish as to hearings between treaties and an executive agreement? The object of an executive agreement is to make a mutually favorable bargain between the two contracting nations. Does not the Senator realize that if the matter were to be heard in public and at length it would tend to embarrass both the governments which were prospective parties to the agreement?

In other words, it has been claimed all along that one of the things necessary is secrecy, and that right must be granted to the President. The argument here is, not in the language of ex-President Wilson, open covenants openly arrived at, and not in accordance with his famous statement in the North American Review of October 1909, where he elaborately discussed the question of secrecy in tariff making, denouncing it as in violation of every standard of integrity. Not in accordance with those statements is the argument offered here, but for some reason not explained, except as affording an opportunity to get better terms, it is claimed that the proceedings should be conducted in secret.

If the Senator will permit further, of course we all agree that treaty making is an Executive function. We all agree that in the making of a treaty the Executive, who is our representative so far as the United States is concerned, should be free, with no interference so far as any of those incidents that might come from publicity, and that nothing should be made public which in his judgment ought not to be made public. We are not finding fault with that.

Mr. HATFIELD. Absolutely not.

Mr. FESS. But the Constitution of the United States, in giving the treaty-making power, which is a sovereign function, into the hands of the President, not requiring it to be made public while it is operating under his direction, requires that the treaty shall come to the Senate and that it must receive the approval of two-thirds of the Members of this body before it can be effected. The only reason why secrecy is permitted on the part of the Executive in making such an agreement is that it will be brought to light later, and must not only be approved here, but must be approved by two-thirds of the Membership of this body before it can be effected.

Now, to state, as is stated by the Assistant Secretary before the committee, "I cannot give these terms that are to be considered but I can suggest that if this bill is enacted into law, then I will be permitted to give the items", means there is something secret about it. It is not only secret in its initiation and in its making, but it is going to be secret in its effectiveness when it shall have been completed. That never was in the minds of the makers of the Constitution and ought not to have the approval of this body at this time.

If the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] means that we are not to have the agreement or treaty made public because the people are not to know what it is, then I think an apology is due to the country for such a statement.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Mississippi never stated that the people of the country must not know. The Senator from Mississippi stated he thought it would be unwise to make it public at this particular time, because and for the reason that it is apparent to the Senator from Ohio, as it is to others here, although I shall not ask him to admit it, that it would be used as a vehicle to discuss and discuss, and delay the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. FESS. Suppose we do?

Mr. HARRISON. I have been here too long and understand parliamentary tactics a little too well to permit, if it is in my power to prevent, such a matter being used as a vehicle for delay.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio that the agreement is bound to come to the Senate sooner or later for ratification and the Senate will have to pass upon it. Of course, if it is decided that the agreement can be brought into conformity with the pending legislation, it will not be necessary that it come before Congress. I stated previously why it has not been made public. There is no need for me to repeat the statement. I am informed by the State Department that public notice was given many months ago that the treaty was being negotiated, and that many of the persons who felt themselves interested in it and had views about it presented their views to the State Department.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is not talking the way the leader on the other side of the Chamber talked. His leader was demanding that secrecy be permitted.

Mr. HARRISON. That secrecy be permitted?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I think for the time being it would jeopardize the interests of the United States to make the treaty public, for the reason I stated a while ago, that there are other nations of South America who are interested in some of the same matters that are involved in the treaty or agreement with Colombia. They have a right under the favored-nation clause to have the same treaty. If we make public now and should approve the treaty or agreement with Colombia at this time those other countries which have the favored-nation clauses would have a right to the same favored treaty, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. FESS. Yes; and they ought to have.

Mr. HARRISON. They ought to have; but it is more advantageous to the United States if we can work out an agreement with those countries quite similar——

Mr. FESS. In secret?

Mr. HARRISON. I did not say in secret—quite similar to the agreement we have with Colombia. There has been no secrecy about this other matter.

Mr. FESS. Oh, yes.

Mr. HARRISON. No; there has not. Public notice was given that these negotiations were on. Interested persons have come and appeared.

Mr. FESS. Nobody knows what is involved.

Mr. HARRISON. When the treaty is made public and comes to the Senate it will be discussed. Under the proposed legislation that is now before us, before any trade agreement is concluded, and when the negotiations have just started, in their preliminary stages, notice will be given, and every interested person will have a right to come and appear, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. Nothing could be fairer; and I may say to the Senator—I am talking directly to the Senator. While I am talking I want the Senator not to read but to listen to me.

Mr. FESS. I am hearing what the Senator says.

Mr. HARRISON. We heard it insisted all around here, and it was said by witness after witness and in speech after speech in the initial stages of this discussion, that we must have a hearing of interested persons before these reciprocal-trade agreements shall be made.

Mr. FESS. And in public.

Mr. HARRISON. No; not in public.

Mr. FESS. Yes; in public.

Mr. HARRISON. We did not hear anything about the hearings being public, and nothing was said by the members of the Finance Committee on the Senator's side about public hearings. They know that whenever it is proposed, in the interest of this Government, to enter into a trade agreement with a foreign country, and a public hearing is held, and the other country is informed of everything that our people say about it, the right results cannot be obtained, and it does not work to the advantage of this Government.

We are trying here to do something to the advantage of the American people; and so, after Senators on the other side had talked for days and days, and the press that their party controls had urged the importance of interested persons having an opportunity to be heard, I myself went to the President and said that some Senators on the other side of the Chamber felt that the passage of this bill could be expedited and much of the opposition to it would be withdrawn if we should write into the bill a provision for giving interested persons a hearing. I am not at liberty to quote the President, but the President never had anything else in his mind but to give interested persons a right to be heard.

Mr. FESS. Then why is it not in the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, however, it ought to be under rules and regulations. So I proposed the amendment, and the State Department endorsed it, and we have written it into the bill.

The truth of the matter is that some of those on the Senator's side could not be satisfied under any circumstances. They want to make political capital out of this matter, and they can go their route on it as much as they please; but whenever they do they will find the Senators on this side of the aisle, with the exception of a very few, fighting to sustain this bill. The bill is going to pass, and we are going to stay here until it does; and I serve notice now, Mr. President, after 10 days of patience, that Senators who yield must abide the consequences. We are going to enforce the rules of the Senate on this bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. There is no need of any further statement from me or any other Member of this body as to the demand for secrecy in tariff making. That is the argument with which the Senator from Mississippi has just closed his statement; and, no matter what may be his subsequent explanations, he has committed himself to the proposition that these proceedings must be secret. That is what we are resisting. We demand that whatever is to be done by the Executive shall be brought to this body before it shall become effective.

The Senator says, "We are going to enact this bill, because we have the votes." Of course he has the votes, and of course it will be enacted; but there will be a second enactment within 2 years from now, and the Senator from Mississippi is one of the first Senators who will realize it. Let him take that and think it over for a while.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi speaks of filibustering and of playing the game of politics. I am nearing the conclusion of my first term in the Senate of the United States. When I came here I was on the majority side; and I have the mental impression, which I shall take away with me, that there was no man on the then minority side who played a bigger game of politics against the Republican organization which was then in control of the Government of this Nation than the senior Senator from Mississippi.

I am not playing politics. I am trying to defend my State. I am trying to defend its industries. I have the conviction that there is only one way in which we can continue the standard of wage which is enjoyed by the 48,000,000 toilers of this Nation, maintaining them far beyond the standard of living of the European or the Asiatic. As long as I am in public life, as long as I have the opportunity to vote in this body or any other body, it will be my great aim and my greatest ambition to protect the toilers of the State of West Virginia in the tin-plate, the pottery, the china, the glass, and the chemical and other industries of that great, growing State.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I want to see if we cannot expedite the passage of this bill and get politics out of it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator has spoken twice today on the same subject matter.

Mr. LONG. I only wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the point of order to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have not spoken twice today. This is the first time I have spoken.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has yielded in his speech many times and allowed other things to come up that were not questions. The rule of the Senate is that a Senator can yield only for a question.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have yielded to the Senator from Mississippi about as often as I have yielded to any other man in this body.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I withdraw my point of order for the present; but I serve notice, as I served it a moment ago, that the rule of the Senate will be enforced, and I shall make the point of order that any Senator who shall speak twice on this subject in one day cannot again take the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. HATFIELD. Does the Senator from Mississippi maintain that I have spoken twice upon this subject today?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has permitted other Senators to interrupt him and make speeches many times today. I withdraw the point for the present, however.

Mr. HATFIELD. That is true; but I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the point at this time.

Mr. HATFIELD. But when the Senator states that I have made two speeches today, the RECORD will not justify his observation.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not think it was necessary for me to state to the Senator from West Virginia, because he has been here a long time, that the rule of the Senate is that no Senator shall speak more than twice on any subject in any one day. That rule has been construed to mean that a Senator may yield for a question, but he may not yield for some other business, or for a speech by some other Senator. I am merely stating that so that the Senator from West Virginia may guide himself accordingly.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator from Mississippi should observe the rule himself.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Mississippi knows the rules, and he will observe them himself and will see that they are observed.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator has not observed them today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the rule to be that if a Senator yields for more than a question he loses the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from West Virginia to yield for a question; and if I should transgress the rule in asking the question, I ask the Chair to interrupt me and protect the Senator.

I ask the Senator whether, in order to assist us in eliminating politics from this discussion, he would agree to accept the bill which was proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and was passed by both Houses at the last session and endorsed by the Democratic Party in its convention, as a substitute for the pending bill, and cut out the politics. I am sure the Senator from Mississippi would be glad to nurse his own child.

Mr. HATFIELD. I shall be very glad, indeed, to do that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia answer a question for me? Did I understand the Senator to say that he would vote for that bill?

Mr. HATFIELD. Which bill?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator just said he would. I did not think he would.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, to my mind this treaty is an example of the manner in which our present tariff protection is to be destroyed.

Many Members of this body now seeking reelection begged and pleaded for an excise tax on petroleum. Our imports from the Republic of Colombia consist in a large measure of petroleum and gasoline. Assuming that this treaty with Colombia contains a promise on the part of the United States Government to reduce the tax on imports of petroleum 50 percent, such reduction would automatically apply to every nation with which we have a treaty with the most-favored-nation clause therein.

Mr. President, if the Senate of the United States should fail to demand the immediate presentation of this reciprocal trade treaty with Colombia, it should publicly apologize for the cowardliness about to be displayed by some Members of the Senate at the direction and dictation of the State Department and the officials of the Colombian Government.

Of course, Mr. President, administration spokesmen on this floor, even though they know that every Member of the Senate is conversant with the fact that they had nothing to do with writing this treaty, realize that the American people will bitterly resent our entering into a reciprocal trade treaty with Colombia, or any other country, which results in the American people, through the reduction of our import excise taxes by 50 percent, making a gift of from a million and a half dollars to more than $2,000,000 yearly to the owners of the Gulf Oil Co. and the Standard Oil Co.

Based on imports of petroleum for 1930 from Colombia alone, this presumed decrease of 50 percent in the excise tax of one-half cent per gallon would have meant a gift of $1,633,193 for that year alone.

Not only is this possible and probable but in addition thereto we may soon learn that the negotation of this treaty saved the Gulf Oil Co., the Standard Oil Co., and the United Fruit Co. from the payment of an export tax to Colombia, which, I understand, would amount to an additional million or more dollars yearly.

Mr. President, the American public have been led to believe that the State Department, under the leadership of the Secretary of State and the Department, headed by Mr. George Peek, and I believe former Senator Brookhart, have been making surveys and listing articles and commodities produced in the United States in such small quantities and of so little consequence that such articles might be traded away under the authority sought for in the pending measure.

This problem I dealt with on May 1, 1933, in my analysis of the report of the Tariff Commission, sent to us in response to a Senate resolution offered by the able Senator from Colorado.

It is to be assumed that this same force has listed those articles or commodities, of which we produce, to their mind, an insufficient quantity in the United States, and which articles or commodities produced in foreign countries would be granted privileges which are now denied to them either as the result of tariff rates, sanitary requirements, or other import restrictions.

To my mind, Mr. President, the Senate of the United States should be able to secure some definite information as to the type of treaties which the State Department and other departments connected therewith would make with foreign countries if the authority sought in the pending measure is granted.

There reposes in the files of the State Department a treaty made with Colombia. This treaty, I understand, from the statement released by the State Department and the Colombian Government officials, was made as of December 15, 1933. This treaty is referred to in the press release furnished to me as a reciprocal trade treaty. To my mind there is no good and sufficient reason why the State Department should withhold this treaty from further consideration by the Senate. In fact, Mr. President, I know of no good and sufficient reason why this treaty was not presented to the Senate following the convening of the new Congress in January.

A reciprocal trade treaty between two nations presumably pertains to the principal commodities which one nation imports from the other, and vice versa. The Foreign Commerce Yearbook, published by the Department of Commerce for 1933, on page 188, lists the—

Imports and exports of principal commodities—total trade, and trade with United States (Colombian statistics).

I find in the list I have just referred to that in 1930 we imported from Colombia a million dollars' worth of bananas; 388,757,143 pounds of coffee, valued at 14 cents per pound, or $54,426,000; some 653,277,260 gallons of petroleum, worth $20,530,000; and a million dollars' worth of cattle hides. These are the principal commodities I find listed.

At the present time bananas and coffee are on the free list; therefore there would be nothing gained by Colombia in entering into a reciprocal trade treaty with the United States wherein we agreed that bananas and coffee would be admitted free of duty.

They are already admitted free of duty. Coffee is not grown in the United States, as we all know, and there is no justification for any man in the Congress of the United States, or anyone else who might have the responsibility, placing a tariff on coffee.

Therefore, Mr. President, any benefits which we grant to the Colombian Government in this reciprocal trade agreement must pertain to the importation of petroleum and animal hides. Animal hides bear a duty of 10 percent, I believe, while petroleum bears an excise tax of one-half cent per gallon.

Mr. President, in view of the low value of cattle hides, it is hardly possible that Colombia entered into this reciprocal trade agreement with the United States in order to secure a lower tax on the cattle hides which they export already to the United States.

This being true, the only benefits which the people of Colombia presumably secure through this secret and much-concealed reciprocal trade agreement must come from an agreement made by the State Department whereby the $20,000,000 worth, or 653,227,260 gallons of petroleum which we import will be entered into the United States at a lower tax than is paid at the present time.

If I understand correctly the meaning of the most-favored-nation clause, as soon as we present to Colombia the opportunity and the privilege of dumping her $20,000,000 worth of petroleum into the United States at lesser rates than now prevail, that same privilege must automatically go to all the other nations with which we have treaties containing the most-favored-nation clause.

Mr. President, to many real Americans interested in the upbuilding of their country, the lack of interest on the part of some of our larger industries in the question now pending before the Senate has been the subject of considerable comment. When it is said or contended that in giving to the Colombian people the right to dump their $20,000,000 of petroleum into the United States at a lesser tax than is now paid by them, we are benefiting the people of that country, that is a false statement.

As a result of the inspiring leadership of the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] the Senate of the United States is aware of the fact that the principal owners of Colombian oil lands are the Gulf Oil Co. and the Standard Oil Co. These two gigantic American concerns possess, through subsidies, large and extensive holdings of oil lands in Colombia. Naturally, the principal market for their product is the United States.

A little more than a year ago the Senator from California developed the fact, at hearings before the Finance Committee, that in order that certain concessions in which Americans were interested should be confirmed by the Colombian Government through legislative sanction, the State Department through Assistant Secretary White and later through a Mr. Mathews, virtually forced the officials of the National City Bank to pay over to the Colombian Government some $4,000,000 which the National City Bank officials were withholding because of the failure of the Colombian Government to make good certain conditions which had been agreed to when a loan was privately consummated between the National City Bank and the officials of Colombia.

There has been considerable talk of the benefits which accrue under reciprocal trade agreements, and in the case of the particular case before us, namely, the reciprocal trade agreement with Colombia, three of the principal concessionaires in that country are American concerns, namely, the Gulf Oil Co., which possesses what is known as "the Barco concession"; the Standard Oil Co., and the United Fruit Co.

It is my understanding, Mr. President, that this treaty was entered into with Colombia with the understanding that it would become effective when ratified by the legislative bodies of both countries. I know nothing of the action taken in Colombia, but I do know that such treaty has yet to be presented to the Senate for ratification.

Colombia statistics, as shown in the report published by the Department of Commerce for 1930, show that during the year 1930 the United States imported from Colombia 653,227,260 gallons of petroleum, valued at some 3 cents per gallon. On the basis of a reduction of 50 percent in the present excise tax of one-half cent per gallon, the United States would make a gift of from a million and a half dollars to two million dollars per year, on the basis of 1930 imports, to the Gulf Oil Co. and the Standard Oil Co.

While the Secretary of the Interior is clamoring for legislation which will prevent American oil products from supplying the demands of the American market, this treaty will open the door for our domestic oil distributors and refiners to continue to import Colombian and other oils at a reduction of 50 percent in the present excise tax on imported oils. Consistency, Mr. President, is said to be a jewel. Apparently those American oil companies holding oil concessions in Colombia look upon petroleum as a rare jewel.

Unless the proponents of the reciprocal trade treaty measure now before the Senate wish to contend that they had in mind having this treaty ratified by Executive action alone, then I feel we are justified in believing that it was expected that the Senate should ratify this treaty.

For that reason, Mr. President, I ask immediate consideration and favorable action on the resolution which I have presented for consideration.

Mr. President, of course, I know it may be useless to ask for the immediate consideration of this resolution, for the very good reason that it has already been stated by the Senator who champions the reciprocal tariff bill, the senior Senator from Mississippi, that under no circumstances will he advise the Secretary of State or the President of the United States to submit this treaty to the Senate of the United States even behind closed doors in secret session.

However, Mr. President, I ask for immediate consideration of my resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall object, if the Senator is asking for immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I move that the pending business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] calling upon the Secretary of State to transmit immediately to the Senate a copy of the reciprocal trade agreement between the Governments of the United States and Colombia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BONE in the chair). It is the understanding of the chair that the motion is not in order; that such action can only be taken by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator from Louisiana mean to make his motion?

Mr. LONG. I mean to make the motion to lay aside the pending bill until we find out what was done with the treaty between the United States and Colombia.

Mr. CLARK. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from West Virginia still has the floor, as I understand.

Mr. HATFIELD. No; I yielded the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Hebert	Pope
Ashurst	Cutting	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Davis	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Dickinson	Keyes	Russell
Bankhead	Dieterich	King	Schall
Barbour	Dill	Lewis	Sheppard

Costigan	Hayden	Pittman	White

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] occasioned by official business, and the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] occasioned by illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Louisiana insists on his motion?

Mr. LONG. No. I have decided to let the responsibility rest right where it ought to belong, namely, in the State Department, for not being willing to disclose this treaty. I do not want the Senate to take the position of relieving the Department of State. So I will not insist upon the motion, and, if I may, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, this is the most far-reaching tariff legislation that was ever brought before the Congress. It is true that it is not the ordinary tariff bill in that it does not undertake to deal with the thousands of items in a general tariff. I assume that, because of the narrow issue involved, it was hoped and expected by the proponents of the legislation to pass it through the Senate very quickly.

When it was first taken up for consideration in the Senate Finance Committee the distinguished chairman expressed the hope that we might conclude our hearings upon it within 2 or 3 days. Certain members of the Cabinet, as well as some of their assistants, were first heard, and, in addition to that, the Chairman of the Tariff Commission. As I recall, when we approached the point of hearing those who were opposed to the measure, the clerk reported that there were 186 persons who desired to be heard.

I think the time fixed for hearing them was increased from the 2 days suggested by the chairman to 3 days. The hearings show that 4 days were given to hearings on this important measure—Thursday and Friday of one week and Monday and Tuesday of the following week. The hearings lasted all day, and some of us who had important matters in the Senate were able to attend but a small part of the time. The bill was taken up in the Senate on Thursday, May 17, and my recollection is that the very next day the distinguished and genial chairman of the committee suggested that we, at that time, agree that, beginning on a certain day, Wednesday of the following week, there might be a limitation of debate upon this measure. For the last few days we have been meeting at 11 o'clock instead of 12 o'clock, the usual time. The distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the leader on this side of the Chamber, on May 17, called attention to the fact that legislative scenes had been shifting rapidly; that within the past 5 or 6 days we had had four measures of major importance before the Senate for consideration; that they had come upon us with such rapidity that no one had had an opportunity thoroughly to study the hearings on the pending bill or to give to the subject matter the attention to which it was entitled. He expressed regret that the Republican members of the Finance Committee who had heard the testimony were not then present. He assumed that they would be, as under normal conditions they should be, in a better position to discuss the measure than would other Senators.

I thoroughly agree that we have been rushing headlong with legislation without giving it full and adequate consideration.

This proposed legislation is the most important of all, and I express the hope that the majority will not insist upon its passage until we shall have had the fullest opportunity to discuss it; and I express the further hope that the Senate will not be kept in session such a length of time on any day as will unnecessarily test the physical endurance of the Members of the body.

Assurance has been given by the distinguished leader on this side of the Chamber that there will be no filibuster; and I am quite certain there is enough loyalty to him on this side to make certain that that personal assurance will in no sense be violated.

My own discussion of this question will be somewhat lengthy, but I shall not enter into any discussion which I do not personally believe to be pertinent and of some importance.

I shall not discuss the question of the constitutionality of this proposed act for two reasons: First, it would greatly extend my remarks; and, second, because I think the splendid argument made by the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was so complete in itself that there could be no reasonable answer to it.

In order that I may not take more time than is necessary, I have placed in type a greater portion of my remarks, and I propose to discuss the following phases of this subject:

First. I shall show that this proposed act is based upon an emergency, but that it, nevertheless, gives to the President authority to make contracts lasting as long as 6 years, unless during the next 3 years the measure itself shall be repealed.

Second. That the flexible provision left in the bill proposes to give the President authority, with the aid of the Tariff Commission, to reduce tariff rates or increase tariff rates by 75 percent, instead of 50 percent, as appearing on the face of the bill.

Third. That the definition of "duties and other import restrictions", found on page 4 of the bill, adds three additional methods of decreasing the tariff rates, thus making a total of five methods and thus giving to the President the full power absolutely to destroy the present tariff law.

Fourth. That the amendment placed in the bill by the Senate Finance Committee, known as section 4 and found on page 6, might very well be declared to be a sham and a delusion.

Fifth. Speculation as to what will be included in the bargaining list, drawn from statements made upon the subject by administration officials and others.

Sixth. A brief illustration showing that under the present law exports in leading commodities have actually increased in quantity, instead of having decreased.

Seventh. I shall discuss briefly the most-favored-nation clause in existing treaties and undertake to demonstrate that, while we may agree with one nation, importing into this country certain articles, the effect will be to permit other nations with which we do not bargain to have the benefit of such reduced rates.

Eighth. An analysis of the 1932 Tariff Act, proposed and put through the Congress by its Democratic Members, and the inconsistency of their position under a Republican administration, as compared with their position under the present administration.

Ninth. Finally, I shall read into the RECORD the important parts of speeches made in the Senate in September 1929 condemning the flexible provision of the tariff, which will remain in the law after this legislation shall have been passed, and which speeches point out the dangers of giving such great powers to the Executive.

EMERGENCY

The bill would add to the tariff law, at the end of title III, "Part III—Promotion of foreign trade." The new bill consists of one section only, known as section 350. The purpose of the bill is set forth in the beginning of the section. It is alleged to be "for the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States", and then the following words are added in parentheses:

(As a means of assisting in the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce.)

It will be noted that the excuse for the proposed legislation is "assisting in the present emergency." It is the same excuse or reason given for nearly every important measure which has been passed since March 4, 1933. So far as I now recall, there are but two exceptions—the Securities Act and the regulation of the stock exchange.

It is difficult for me to find any sound reasoning for calling this an emergency measure. If the bill shall prove to be as effective and helpful as its proponents contemplate, then it ought to become a permanent part of the American system. If this be a dangerous proposal, there can be no warrant in adopting it. If it be expected that it will promote prosperity and restore the American standard of living, overcome domestic unemployment, increase the purchasing power of the American public, and establish and maintain a better relation among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce, it will accomplish a purpose that will please millions for all time. In view of the fact that all these purposes are desirable at all times, there is no possible excuse for limiting its operation.

The distinguished Chairman of the Finance Committee calls attention to the fact that it is designed to meet "the emergencies of international trade", to effect "a return of industrial and agricultural stability", and that "the bill is written to meet an emergency arising out of disastrous economic conditions."

The Chairman of the Finance Committee also calls attention to the fact that the authority of the President to enter into foreign-trade agreements shall terminate at the expiration of 3 years from the date of the enactment of the bill. The President is limited in his authority to a 3-year contract. If not terminated in 3 years, it may at any time terminate within 6 months. It will thus be seen that a contract entered into immediately after the bill becomes effective may last the 3 years; but it must at the same time be observed that just prior to the expiration of 3 years, the President may enter into another contract for another term of 3 years. So it is quite possible, under the provisions of the bill, within a short time after it becomes effective, for the President to execute contracts with foreign governments everywhere for a period running until December 1936, and then execute with the same countries additional 3-year contracts which will not expire until December 1939, plus a 6 months' notice.

The 3-year provision, placed in the bill for the purpose of emphasizing the emergency, may very readily extend to a period of 6 years without in any sense violating its provisions, and the Congress itself could not shorten the term. It will be observed that the contract does not have to be for a period of 3 years. As I have pointed out, it may be made in June 1934 and expire in December 1936, and may at that time be renewed for a full 3-year term.

This is the first emergency measure that contemplates an emergency for such a long time. But the Chairman of the Finance Committee seems to appreciate that this emergency measure may become permanent. On page 8989 of the RECORD he stated:

> I am sure that the Senate will appreciate that that is a very wise provision, because if the agreements are advantageous to the United States in opening up new markets to us and in assisting in the sale of our exportable surpluses they ought to be preserved and ought to be maintained and ought to be continued for longer than 3 years.

But an examination of the testimony before the Finance Committee of the Senate shows that the distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, was impressed with the emergency when urging the approval of the bill. When he was being interrogated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] with respect to notice to persons who were effected by change in the tariff, the Secretary said:

> There is a panic on hand now.

When his attention was called to the fact that he opposed the flexible provision when he was a Member of the House, he replied:

> Yes; there was not any panic then.

His attention was called to the fact that at that time, speaking of the flexible provision of the tariff, he said:

> That was too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want.

The Secretary replied:

> I wish the Senator would always agree with me on that, during normal times as well as during panics. That was an occurrence in normal times and not during a panic or emergency.

Further along, the Secretary said:

> This is an emergency measure. I think the Senator had not arrived when I undertook to refer to the chief features of the bill. This is an emergency measure to deal with emergency panic conditions.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] also called the Secretary's attention to an extract from a radio speech delivered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] in October 1929 and inquired whether the Secretary had seen it. The quotation is as follows:

> Not only do we insist that Congress has no right to confer upon the President the power to tax the people, but we insist that it is unwise to do it, whoever the President may be or whatever party he may belong to. This fight is not a fight over personalities. It has no more reference to Mr. Hoover than to Mr. Coolidge or to Mr. Wilson, or to any President who may be elected in the future. It is no answer to our objection to say that the power will not be abused by any particular President. We think it has been abused in several instances in the past, and we have no assurance that it may not be abused at some time in the future.

The Secretary replied:

> I expressly stated at the outset, when the Senator was asking questions, that the bill before us is not an ordinary measure to meet ordinary conditions. It is not an ordinary measure to meet emergency conditions. It is an emergency measure, temporary in its nature, to meet emergency conditions.

It is impossible to read the Secretary's testimony without reaching the conclusion that except for the emergency he would still believe that this power given to the President is—

> Too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want.

The power to which he referred when he used that language was limited to the flexible provision of the tariff, which provided that the President could not do anything without getting the consent of the Tariff Commission, and the Tariff Commission was limited by certain fixed rules. So if at that time the Secretary thought that power was too much for a bad man to have or for a good man to want, I wonder, except for the emergency, what the Secretary would say with respect to this particular power.

There can be no more dangerous thing confronting a democracy than to have the legislative branch of the Government so influenced by the Executive that it passes on to the Executive its own powers and responsibilities upon the demand of the Executive that such power must be vested in him in order to meet an emergency. Patriotic citizens everywhere should bear in mind that their rights and their liberties are always in very much greater danger in times of depression than in times of prosperity.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not want to interfere with the Senator's very able speech, but I was wondering whether 1932 was a year of depression, because in 1932 the Secretary of State said:

> The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions of the flexible tariff clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the conscience of the American Congress.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that statement. I have a memorandum of it which I had intended to read a little more fully later. I am glad to have it appear just here, however.

Here we are at this very moment about to pass on to the Executive the power literally to destroy certain industries, as well as certain farmers of the Nation, and he may do it in an honest effort—

> To restore the American standard of living, overcome domestic unemployment, increase the purchasing power of the American public, and establish and maintain a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce.

His own judgment may be bad, or he may be poorly advised, and, having made a contract for 2½ years, if he becomes convinced that the length of time has not been sufficient to prove the plan successful, he may at the end of that time make a new contract, reducing the tariff on the products of new industries, so that for a period of 6 years, at least, the rights and protection now given under the tariff act will become uncertain. There can be no long-term planning by industries, and, in my judgment, the autocratic power which the President seeks will destroy the laudable purpose he now entertains.

FLEXIBLE PROVISION

Mr. President, I desire to discuss for a moment the flexible provision of the tariff law, and particularly with respect to some of the testimony offered regarding it.

Much has already been said on the floor of the Senate with respect to the position of the Democrats on the flexible provision of the existing tariff law. In the recent hearings before the Committee on Finance the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], in replying to the portion of his speech delivered in 1929, made the following observation, found on page 23 of the hearings:

Senator BARKLEY. At the time of that speech we were dealing with a one-sided provision empowering the President to levy taxes on the American people without regard to any international trade agreements, and, under the same circumstances, I would make the same speech again.

We are dealing now with an effort not only that has connected with it the phase of taxation, which is not, as I understand it, the prime object of this resolution, but an effort to regulate commerce with foreign nations, which we have the power to do under the Constitution, and I regard this resolution and the effect of it to be more in the nature of a regulation of commerce than it is a levying of taxes, or even in the relation of taxes, and it is entirely a different proposition.

Not only the conditions are different, as you have already pointed out, but the philosophy of this resolution is different.

The word "resolution" there is in error. The language should be "this proposed act."

The remarkable thing to me is that neither Secretary Hull, nor the Senator from Kentucky, nor any other Democrat who was so violently opposed to the flexible provision of the tariff, should have deliberately and purposely left in the pending bill the same flexible provision.

The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], in a colloquy with the Chairman of the Finance Committee, called attention to the fact that the flexible provision remained in the bill, and further called attention to the fact that if this bill shall be passed we will have two tariff-reducing powers in existence. A further colloquy brought from the chairman of the committee a fact which had not theretofore, so far as I know, been emphasized, namely, that if this bill shall be passed it will be perfectly possible to reduce the tariff by 75 percent instead of 50 percent, which I think the public generally understand to be the purpose of the bill. At the present time, as the chairman of the committee admits, there could be a reduction, under the rule fixed in the present tariff law, by the amount of any difference found between the cost of production at home and abroad up to 50 percent, and then the President could by agreement with a foreign country reduce that same tariff rate by another 50 percent, so that a present tariff rate of 50 percent could, upon recommendation of the Tariff Commission, be reduced to 25 percent and then, by Executive agreement with a foreign country, be reduced again to 12½ percent.

In this connection it might be well to call attention to the testimony given by the present Chairman of the Tariff Commission. It will be found beginning on page 143 of the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee; and if Senators are interested in getting a true picture of the high character, the high purpose, and a due regard for his oath of office of that individual, I suggest they read that testimony.

Mr. O'Brien appeared before the House committee as well as before the Senate committee, and in both instances insisted that there was no difference in the President's power under the flexible provision of the tariff and the powers given to him under this proposed act. On page 144 the record shows that he said:

Now, we talk about the flexibility. This is known as the "flexible tariff." I regard the term, applied to our present law, as an extreme joke.

I desire to read from those hearings some of the testimony, beginning on page 150. Mr. O'Brien was the witness, and said:

Another thing I wanted to bring out to this group here, this committee—the present law is Presidential tariff making. The new law is Presidential tariff making.

Senator HASTINGS. I should like you to tell us just how that is. Why do you say it is Presidential tariff making? Do you eliminate from the consideration the entire Tariff Board, under the present law? Is it true that the Tariff Commission now has no functions to perform with respect to this principal provision of the tariff?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Why, of course, it has functions to perform.

Senator HASTINGS. Well, does it perform them?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Yes, sir; we bring in quite a few reports from time to time. They must be approved by the President.

Senator HASTINGS. Well, is it or not true that the Tariff Commission exercises an independent judgment; or is it, as I think I saw where you stated before the House committee, wholly subject to and under the control of the President?

Mr. O'BRIEN. The President appoints the Tariff Commissioners. Most men in positions wish to retain them and be reappointed.

Senator HASTINGS. Does that prevent you from doing what you think your duty is under this tariff act?

Mr. O'BRIEN. It does not prevent my doing it, or my associates.

Senator HASTINGS. Do you know of any other member of the Tariff Commission that you think is influenced by a fear that he will lose his job if he does not do what the President suggests with respect to a tariff? I think the country is entitled to know whether we have gone all these years under a false color with respect to that.

Senator CONNALLY. Yes; he will tell you.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The President appoints the members of the Tariff Commission. Every President has views on the tariff, up or down. His friends have views. I would not, for reasons of official propriety, disclose any concrete or specific incidents of this kind, either past, present, or I might say future, but I think that you know, Senator, that you have access to the President of the United States, and that every Senator, particularly of the party of the President of the United States, has access to the President. Tariffs are not a taboo subject. Every President has theories, has beliefs of what he wants to do regarding the tariff. At least, his senatorial and other friends have views of what they want to do. The President appoints the Tariff Commissioners. President Roosevelt will have the privilege, in the term for which he is now elected, of filling five of the six places on the Tariff Commission, and any President can pick out his kind of members of the opposite party, men who are more or less in sympathy with his point of view, assuming that he has a point of view. At all times, the White House and the Tariff Commission are not unrelated factors in the community. I do not wish to say more than that your own common sense and Washington experience will show you these things.

On page 151 this appears:

Senator HASTINGS. Well, I might say this, that I think somebody might be suspicious that that sort of thing was from time to time going on, but the shocking thing to me is that the chairman of that board should come before a committee and say that was a fact.

Senator CONNALLY. If it is a fact, why shouldn't he say it?

Senator HASTINGS. Well, I am just trying to find out.

Mr. O'BRIEN. And my statement is that I do not think, for instance, that in 1924 the Tariff Commission would have brought in a report changing the duty on wheat from 30 to 42 cents if they had known it would be received with profound disfavor and disgust by the then President of the United States, who was in that year a candidate for reelection. I do not think that you can separate the Tariff Commission's functions from the President of the United States and his personal interests.

On page 153 the following appears:

It looks to me that the power that you grant the President—this 50-percent reduction—is exactly the grant he has now, only you have substituted——

Senator HASTINGS. I wonder, just there, do you know whether or not your associates on the Tariff Commission will agree with that statement? Do you think you can get a single one of them to agree with that statement?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think so. They are all within sight or sound, here. They can all be summoned here. They can all come here, and I would feel very reluctant to express views for them. They have not, any of them, been to me to protest over what I said before the Ways and Means Committee.

Senator HASTINGS. Well, remember now what you said. You said that he has power, now, and you said it, time and time again, and I insist that, under the law, he has not got it now until the Tariff Commission Act, and under your theory, as I get it, the Tariff Commission amounts to nothing, so far as this thing is concerned, so far as this flexible provision is concerned. Do you want to leave the record in that sort of situation?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Not having made that record, I would not like to leave it that way.

Senator HASTINGS. Well, you have just said that, time and time again.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I did not say the Tariff Commission amounted to nothing.

Again, on page 154, another question was directed to Mr. O'Brien by me:

Senator HASTINGS. Isn't there a rule by which the Tariff Commission must act?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Yes, sir.

Senator HASTINGS. You would not violate that rule just because the President suggested he wanted something done, would you knowingly violate that rule?

Mr. O'BRIEN. That tariff on wheat could be taken up, with entire propriety, at any time, and the law requires the Tariff Commission to take up the subject that the President or Congress——

Senator HASTINGS. But if you found the facts did not warrant you in recommending to the President that which he wanted done, you do not mean to tell the country and this committee that you, as a member of the Tariff Commission, would do it, do you?

Mr. O'BRIEN. No such situation would arise. Take on the wheat business; why have we not done anything on that for so long?

Senator HASTINGS. But you said just a moment ago if the President should indicate to the Tariff Commission that he wanted a certain thing done, the Tariff Commission would undoubtedly find a way to do it. Now, I ask you the question whether they would do that, in view of the fact that the law specifically sets forth the rules by which they must arrive at their conclusion?

Mr. O'BRIEN. These things are left in a very vague area. Nobody would be violating any law or any oath of office who reduced the duty on wheat at the present time, or particularly during the year when its selling price was less than its duty.

Senator HASTINGS. Well, suppose the President picked out something other than wheat, and picked out something that the facts would not permit you to do, to carry out his wishes. What would the Tariff Commission do under circumstances like that?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Why, I would go up and talk with the President about it and tell what the difficulties in the thing were, and any President has been very—all the Presidents, through the history of the Tariff Commission, have as a rule been very reasonable-minded about it. If you were to prod me too strongly on this, I am afraid my discretion would vanish, and I would tell you of one President under whom I did not serve, who became very angry at the Tariff Commission's attitude, and subsequently apologized to its chairman for speaking to him harshly upon the very issues that you raise.

I desire to observe here that this witness who insisted that the Tariff Commission was so controlled by the President that it would do just what he wanted it to do relates in a portion of his testimony a quarrel which a President had with the Tariff Commission because it did not want to do what the President wanted to have done. I read further:

I want only to say that you can see for yourself, gentlemen, the President is accessible to every member of this committee, let us say. Any President has other relations and interests in the world. Does it stand to reason that when there is standing on the President's desk a proposal of the Tariff Commission to reduce the duty of this white paper, let us say, and everybody knows that such a proposition is awaiting the President, a proposal to reduce the duty on that white paper—bad illustration, but I will keep on with it—50 percent, would it not occur to the common sense of all observers that people could get at the President? I mean, in a perfectly proper and intelligent and patriotic way, to call his attention to how bad we think it would be to reduce the tariff 50 percent. If that could not be done, just how does one account for the cases upon which the Presidents have not followed the Tariff Commission, the number of things they have sent back for reconsideration? It is no disrespect to the White House Office Building, with its groups of employees, to say that no one would claim that its Bureau of Scientific Investigation was superior to that of the Tariff Commission. In other words, where any President has not followed the Tariff Commission, he has done so for reason other than scientific ascertainment theoretically contemplated by the existing law.

The distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Finance was so much pleased with Mr. O'Brien's testimony that he referred to it in his speech explaining the bill and called attention to the fact that he happened to be a Republican.

I do not care where he comes from or what his politics is or who appointed him. I think he exhibited such a disregard for the duties imposed upon him as a member of the Tariff Commission as to make him unworthy of holding any such position. So far as I am concerned, if I believed a majority of the Tariff Commission were as willing as is Mr. O'Brien to do the bidding of the Chief Executive in order to keep their jobs, I should certainly be in favor of repealing the flexible provision of the tariff.

In view of this testimony and in view of the administration's desire to leave this flexible provision in the law, one is forced to the conclusion that the purpose is to give to the Executive the power to use both methods in dealing with the tariff, and thus reduce it 75 percent instead of what appears on the face of the bill to be 50 percent.

Mr. President, I must say that I am a little disappointed that the chairman of the committee should be so certain of his position that he pays no attention to the arguments made on this side of the Chamber against the pending bill. There is a proposal in the bill with respect to the definition of duties and other import restrictions, and I hoped I might have had his attention when I discussed it.

DEFINITION OF DUTIES AND OTHER IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

It will be observed that the President, by paragraph 2 of section 350 (a) of this bill, is given authority—

To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions—

And so forth.

Paragraph (c) of the same section gives a definition of the term "duties and other import restrictions", and I desire to call attention to the importance of this definition and the extent to which it goes.

Mr. President, may I express the hope that the Senators who have not carefully analyzed the entire meaning of this bill will read tomorrow the analysis which I am about to make of it and see whether or not they agree with me.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, before the Senator embarks upon what must necessarily be a discussion in detail of considerable importance, may I bring him back to the observation he has just indulged as to the member of the Tariff Commission who is known as "Mr. Robert Lee O'Brien." I do not know whether the able Senator from Delaware knows Mr. O'Brien. I know him, but not with an intimacy comparable to that of the eminent Republican Senators. May I not ask this question: With respect to the testimony of Mr. O'Brien, in which he referred to the fact that the President no doubt would make a suggestion if he had a conviction, or that the members of the Commission would no doubt adopt the President's view, does not the able Senator fancy that what he meant to convey was that, as the President is held to responsibility, and under the flexible provision is allowed to change the rates up or down if the recommendations of his Tariff Commission commend themselves to him, the President would be obeyed in those matters wherein he must take a responsibility, as it is the President himself who makes the change and not the Tariff Board, which Board merely investigates under the direction of the President? The President himself reaches the conclusion and makes the decision. Does not the Senator feel that Mr. O'Brien merely meant to say that, in view of that fact, the President's desire upon the question became at once the judgment which had to be followed, and therefore the Board merely obeyed it?

Mr. HASTINGS. As nearly as I can find, any possible excuse for Mr. O'Brien's attitude and statement it is that, after the Tariff Commission makes a scientific investigation and submits a recommendation to the President under the flexible provision of the tariff, because there is nothing to compel the President to take that final judgment of the Tariff Commission, in that sense the flexible provision of the tariff is not entirely effective. To be as liberal and generous as one can be with him, one cannot find any other excuse for what he said when he undertook to say that this was Presidential tariff making.

What shocks me, and what I think any respectable man ought to be ashamed to admit, is that because he is appointed by the President and because his term expires, or the President under the Constitution has a right to remove him, the President has an influence on him in trying to determine a fact which is governed by a rule fixed by the Congress. That is what I complain about, and that is what is shocking to me.

I never saw Mr. O'Brien before the time of the hearing, and the impression I got was that he wanted to do most of the talking and did not like it when anyone interrupted him. That is the greatest complaint I have to make with respect to him. But there cannot be any defense of what he said; there cannot be any defense of what he admitted; and I say frankly that if a different kind of men cannot be obtained to assist in administering the flexible provision of the tariff, then those Senators who were opposed to that provision some years ago were entirely justified. I never believed, and I do not believe now that it is true. The chairman himself proved that it was not true, because he called attention to the fact that the President became angry at the Tariff Commission because he wanted a certain recommendation followed and could not get it, which of itself shows that we still live under a constitutional form of government and still have honest officials undertaking to administer the laws of this Nation.

Mr. LEWIS. May I say to the Senator from Delaware that I do not rise to make any particular defense or in advocacy of the gentleman himself, though I have known him. I was a Member of the House of Representatives during the time when the gentleman served as correspondent, I think, for a Boston newspaper—the Transcript, if I am not in error. Subsequently history records that he returned to Boston and became an eminent editor. He is a character of some renown in literature and, further, as has been intimated by the able Senator in speaking on this subject, a distinguished and leading Republican.

But this much may I add? With his renown, many men know him as a gentleman above the suggestion that his conscience could be overcome or his character overruled from any motive other than that of very honest conviction. The able Senator may upon investigation be assured that not even the President of the United States could have induced him to do a thing or say a thing he did not himself honestly feel was right.

I think the mistake lies in the construction the able Senator from Delaware gives rather than in what transpired. I take it that the gentleman meant that where the President indicated, upon his own knowledge and investigation, he felt a certain feature of the tariff must be changed and that the recommendation of the Commission should be in favor of this or that, and he had the facts to justify such position, then the member of the Tariff Commission would withhold his own previous judgment and yield to that which conflicted with it when expressed by the President.

The able Senator feels that his observations justify the conclusion that he was willing to ascertain what was the point of view of the President and, without regard to any conscience in the matter, yield to it and lend himself to the favor of those who had the appointing power to the position.

Mr. HASTINGS. I may say in reply to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that I have not made these observations about Mr. O'Brien based upon rumors I have heard about his conduct of his office. I never heard a word said against him in my life. What I have said is not based upon rumors, and it is not based upon what somebody told me. It is based upon what I heard from his own lips and what I read into the RECORD a few moments ago. If someone can take that language and make a defense of it, I should be delighted to have it done, because I think it is a slur upon every administrative officer of the whole land. I did not like to leave the RECORD as it stood, and I repeated it and asked him if he intended to leave that impression, and the Senator from Illinois has heard me read the answers which he made to those particular questions.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator for allowing me to interrupt him to inject the viewpoint I have. I still insist it is a mere difference of construction, and that the RECORD might do a great injustice to a gentleman where he cannot defend or justify himself, which I think we would all regret.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think, in view of the fact that I have placed in the RECORD his exact language, if I have been unjust to him, those reading the RECORD will see that I was mistaken in my interpretation, and what I have said will do him no harm.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Were any other members of the Tariff Commission given an opportunity either to substantiate or disprove or protest against the statements made by the Chairman of the Tariff Commission?

Mr. HASTINGS. So far as I know the matter was not pursued further. The Chairman of the Tariff Commission was brought before the committee of the Senate, as he was brought before the committee of the House. He made the statement before the two committees, and he made it time and time again, that the President has the power now to regulate the tariff and "what you are giving him by this bill is not different from that which he now has." That was stated time and time again, not by somebody who does not know about the subject, but by the Chairman of the Tariff Commission who knows the act under which he was appointed, who knows the rule that is laid down to guide him. He came before the committee, and the news went out all over the country that the Chairman of the Tariff Commission had said that this bill will give the President no more power than he now has, that he has now the opportunity to change the tariff 50 percent up or 50 percent down.

Mr. HATFIELD. But does not the Senator feel that it was an injustice to the other members of the Tariff Commission that they were not given an opportunity by the Finance Committee to be heard upon the statement made by the Chairman of the Tariff Commission as to the attitude of the President in controlling the Commission in arriving at its conclusions?

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, I was not chairman of the committee, and I did not suggest that any of them be called. So far as I know, nothing was done about it. Mr. O'Brien said they were here about the city and could be called.

There was a suggestion made to me afterwards that the names would be given to me, and that if I would call them, I would find they would take a different position from that of Mr. O'Brien.

I did not pursue the matter. This was an "emergency" measure, and the chairman of the committee was anxious to get through with the hearings, anxious to get the bill reported to the Senate, and anxious to have it passed. I did not want to do anything that would look as though I was trying to interfere with his wishes in the matter.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Did the Chairman of the Tariff Commission state there was no more authority given in the pending bill than the President now has under the present law?

Mr. HASTINGS. He said it not only once, but he said it many times.

Mr. FESS. Is it a proper inference, then, that the present law, which provides for the collection of data by a fact-finding commission under a certain formula, is a law which says "find what the President wants and then undertake to establish that by facts, so that the President will have the final say regardless of the facts"?

Mr. HASTINGS. It was difficult for me to draw any other possible conclusion, although I propounded that identical question by inquiring of Mr. O'Brien whether or not he was willing to violate his oath in order to please the President. He promptly denied that he or any other member of the Commission would violate his oath, and then undertook to make some excuse by saying that it was so vague as to what facts were to be determined that he might reach any conclusion without violating his oath.

Mr. FESS. If that is the policy of the Tariff Commission it ought to be abolished.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is the conclusion I reached.

Mr. President, I shall return to that part of the bill to which I desire to call the especial attention of Senators. It will be observed that the President, by section 2 of the bill, is given authority "to proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions", and so forth. I am quite certain there will be many Senators on both sides of the Chamber, if they agree with my analysis of this section, who will agree with me that it ought to be modified.

Paragraph (c) of the same section gives a definition of the term "duties and other import restrictions", and I desire to call attention to the importance of this definition and the extent to which it goes.

The definition first includes "rate and form of import duties and classification of articles." There is in those words, as I shall undertake to show, an unlimited authority to the President actually to destroy the tariff act.

The general impression is that the authority given to the President under this measure is to increase or decrease the present tarff duties by 50 percent. If that were all the power given him, section 2 would merely provide that the President was given authority "to proclaim such modification of existing rates of duty." Bear in mind, however, that that is not the only authority. He is given authority over the "rate and form of import duties and classification of articles." That would limit the authority of the President to the 50-percent increase or decrease as before suggested; but the very next important authority refers to the "form of import duties." That means that where, in the tariff act, it is provided that the ad valorem rates shall be based upon the American selling price of any similar competitive article manufactured or produced in the United States, it can be changed from the American selling price to the foreign selling price, which is of a great importance, at least to the chemical industry, to which this provision especially applies.

That, however, is not the only change that can be made. Section 402 of the Tariff Act of 1930 undertakes to give the basis of the value. This has to be administered by the appraiser. It provides that he shall take as the value the foreign value or the export value, whichever is higher. If this cannot be satisfactorily ascertained, then he shall take the United States value. If neither the foreign value or the United States value can be ascertained, then he shall take the cost of production.

The assessment of duty under all of these important provisions of the present tariff act may be changed by the inclusion in this bill of the one word "form." Instead of the appraiser selecting the values under the provisions of section 402, which Congress has so carefully provided for the protection of the revenue, the President could make the selection of the form of duty, and if the commodity is now being appraised on the American selling price, or the United States value, he could proclaim that the new rate shall be taken on foreign value. In other words, there is a broad authority, and apparently an intended authority, to give to the President the opportunity to change entirely the form applied to import duties.

Mr. President, I got the impression that that was correct, and I checked it somewhat to be certain. After I had satisfied myself that it was correct I discovered a discussion of the Tariff Act of 1929 by the late distinguished Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh. He called attention to the meaning of this language, and he also called attention to its importance, and stated that the Senate had stricken the language out of the House bill because they were afraid it would render the act unconstitutional.

> Mr. WALSH of Montana. After that bill was reported containing the provisions to which I have called attention, argument followed upon the floor of the Senate against the constitutionality of that feature of the measure, and eventually the provisions so assailed were eliminated, and those which now appear in the law were substituted in their stead.
> Another change was made with respect to language which I shall now read:
> "Whenever the President * * * shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the said differences in conditions of competition in trade, he shall, by such investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim" now observe "changes in classification or forms of duty or increases or decreases in any rate of duty."
> In the revised Senate committee amendment the words "forms of duties" were eliminated. The argument had evidently alarmed the sponsors for the bill and an effort was made to free it from its more vulnerable features.
> The Smoot amendment and the present law are the same in that respect. They both omit the words "forms of duties" but retain "changes in classification."

I desire to call attention here to the fact that in this bill both phrases are left—both "forms of duties" and the "changes in classification."

> "Changes in classification", as I understand, relates to changes from one paragraph to another where a different rate prevails, and "changes in forms of duty" I understand to be a proposal to change ad valorem duties to specific duties, or vice versa.
> Mr. President, if we can constitutionally grant this power to the President, why should we not give him the right to transfer specific rates to ad valorem rates in order to equalize the difference in the cost of production? Evidently Senators on the other side, enlightened by whatever discussion took place upon the floor, concluded that they had better not take a chance on giving any such power to the President. So I believe it has been the reasoned conclusion of the Senate of the United States that an act would be unconstitutional framed in the language of the House provision of the bill before us.

But perhaps there is a more important and a more dangerous provision in the first part of that definition. It includes not only the rate and form of import duties but the "classification of articles."

"Classification of articles" gives to the President more power than the limitation of 50 percent of the present tariff act. The only authority at all in the present tariff law with respect to the change of classification is in the flexible provision. Under the flexible provision of the Tariff Act of 1930, upon recommendation of the Tariff Commission, the President may change the classification, and thus enlarge his power to increase or reduce the tariff rates 50 percent. The Tariff Commission is limited by certain specific rules. The President is not in any sense limited here. If he is given authority to change the classification, he may change an article bearing a rate of 70 percent to a class having a duty of only 35 percent, and thus reduce the tariff by 50 percent before he begins his reduction of 50 percent, so that the article bearing a duty of 70 percent would ultimately be reduced to 17½ percent. Under the flexible provision of the tariff he may reduce it by 50 percent upon recommendation of the Tariff Commission, and then, under the authority given him by this bill, he may reduce it by another 50 percent; but he really has three opportunities here to reduce the tariff. Upon recommendation of the Tariff Commission he may reduce it 50 percent. He may then reclassify it, and thus reduce it another 50 percent; and then he may make an agreement with a foreign country reducing it an additional 50 percent. So, if the provision with respect to the classification of articles remains in the bill, the whole rate structure in the tariff bill falls; the 50-percent provision in the bill becomes of little importance, because under the authority of classification there is absolutely no limit to what the President can do.

Now let us take the second part of the definition, which includes "limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties, imposed on importation or imposed for the regulation of imports."

The words "limitations, prohibitions, and charges" are not difficult to understand. Under this authority will come embargoes, quotas, and similar restrictions which the President at the present time under the existing law has the power to impose. For example, cattle from Mexico are prohibited from entering the United States because of the presence of the hoof-and-mouth disease. There is an embargo on bulbs from Holland because of a plant disease; shrubbery from Japan is prohibited because of the San Jose scale; and numerous other limitations are placed on imports under existing laws, all of which may be removed at the President's pleasure, under the bill.

The particular thing to which I desire to call the Senate's attention, however, are the words "exactions other than duties." This provision would give to the President the power to exempt certain imports from the operation of excise taxes, internal-revenue taxes, and other levies under existing laws. At the present time, if there be imported into this country an article upon which there is an internal-revenue tax, it becomes the duty of the custom officials to see that that tax is paid before releasing the goods to the importer. The courts have held that, regardless of how such taxes may be designated by the Congress, if they are imposed on imports while in customs custody, they are essentially customs duties and are determinable and collectible as prescribed by law. In other words, under this act the internal-revenue tax on distilled spirits, wines, and cordials, and fermented malt liquors, as well as on cigars, cigarettes, snuff, and tobacco, playing cards, yachts, lubricating oil, matches, gasoline, tires, toilet preparations, furs, jewelry, automobile trucks and parts, radios, mechanical refrigerators, sporting goods, firearms and shells, pistols and revolvers, cameras and lenses, candy, chewing gum, soft drinks, oleomargarine, as well as many other articles, could, by the proclamation of the President, be relieved of the internal-revenue tax, as well as the reduction of the 50 percent in the tariff rate.

I particularly want the attention of those Senators who are interested in the tax on imported articles in the Revenue Act of 1932. Some of the articles at least will be found in section 601 of that act. They include crude petroleum, fuel oil, gasoline or other motor fuel, lubricating oil, paraffin and other petroleum wax products; coal of all sizes, grades, and classifications, with certain exemptions; lumber of many kinds; copper-bearing ores, and so forth. The taxes on these articles may all be done away with by agreements with foreign countries.

Those who are interested in protecting the oil industry in this country may get a fair idea about what will happen to the present tax on oil if they will read the speech of Secretary Hull made when he was a Member of the Senate on May 19, 1932, as follows:

> Here comes the giant oil industry, a great $12,000,000,000 business in this country, involving a natural resource which does not cost anybody a penny to create, a great industry which has had to its advantage during the past 10 years a favorable balance of exports in the huge amount of $3,600,000,000, coming here and complacently demanding that the people's representatives, the representatives of the American public, shall vote to this huge octopus—and I say that in no spirit of criticism—a special subsidy running up into the hundreds of millions of dollars, to be paid for largely by the 30,000,000 farm population, hopelessly prostrate, overwhelmed with debt, with commodity prices so low it does not pay to remove farm products from the farm; a demand also that the wage-earning population, which, with their families aggregate sixty to seventy million, together with the agricultural population, shall bear the lion's share of this bald, unadulterated subsidy in the way of an increased price, under tariff shelter, above what the price to the farmer and wage earner would otherwise be.

So it seems to me that those who are interested in maintaining and protecting the oil industry by having that tax remain on the statute books might very well consider whether or not they are giving too much power to the President under this bill.

It will thus be observed that this one section of the bill is quite as important as the provision which limits the President's power to 50 percent of the present tariff rates, if not more important.

If it be true that the word "form" in this definition does not have the important meaning which I have given to it, if it be true that it is not intended to give authority for the classification of articles as suggested by me, if it be true that it is not intended to give the power to the President to remove the internal-revenue tax from the articles on the list of items which I have given, then the proponents of this bill ought to make it perfectly clear that it is not intended to pass any such power over to the President under this definition.

The power given to the President under the proposed act is generally understood to be limited to 50 percent of the tariff rates now existing. The Chairman of the Committee on Finance admits that under the terms of the bill the flexible provision is left in it, and that it is perfectly possible for the President to make two reductions of 50 percent each, one upon recommendation of the Tariff Commission and the other by agreement with a foreign power. If the word "form" is left in this definition, an additional authority is given, under which the reduction to be made is mere speculation. If we leave the right to classify the articles under this definition, we give almost unlimited authority to the Executive to again reduce the tariff rate. If we leave the words "exactions other than duties imposed on importations", we give the opportunity to exempt from taxation all imported articles upon which a special tax has been imposed.

I call the attention of the Senate especially to these facts. It is proposed by the pending bill that there be invested in the President of the United States these powers:

First. Reduction of the present tariff rates by 50 percent upon recommendation of the Tariff Commission.

Second. A further reduction of 50 percent by Executive agreement with a foreign country.

Third. A further reduction by changing the form of the import duties.

Fourth. A further reduction by changing the classification of the article upon which the tariff exists.

Fifth. A further reduction by eliminating internal-revenue taxes upon many articles imported.

Thus it appears that the authority of reduction by 50 percent, which is so shocking to many of us, becomes only a small part of the tremendous power given under the bill and results in the conclusion that the tariff act may at the will of the President become almost wholly destroyed.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I have listened to the Senator's recital of the powers to be given to the President under the pending bill. Is not that tantamount to an approach to absolute free trade with other countries, under the power proposed to be given the President?

Mr. HASTINGS. As I have pointed out, in my judgment—and I have not exaggerated the situation—a careful examination of this tariff bill shows five means of reduction; it shows five distinct and separate ways of reducing the tariff, and certainly those five different ways can be so manipulated that if the President wanted to he could leave this country without any tariffs at all to protect either farm products or the products of any industry of the Nation.

I have undertaken to emphasize this fact because I think the general impression has gone abroad that, however much we may dislike this particular measure, the President can not do more than he has had the power to do heretofore under the flexible provision of the tariff, except that under that provision he was bound to have certain facts found, namely, the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and if we pass this bill and give the President that power, he will be limited, after all, to making a reduction of 50 percent.

If Senators will review the newspaper comments concerning the President's proposal, ever since it was made, there will nowhere be found any suggestion that the President was given any more power than to reduce the tariff 50 percent or to increase it 50 percent; and not until the colloquy between the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the distinguished chairman of the committee the other day did I realize that it was possible to have a 50-percent reduction, first, under the flexible provision of the tariff, and then another 50-percent reduction by a contract with a foreign nation.

That was the first shocking thing about the bill that came to my attention. Then I began to analyze the bill, and I found something in it which, perhaps, some Senators have not discovered. I do not know how many Senators know that it is in the bill; I do not know how many have made a careful analysis of it; but I will say that I found under the language used, "the rate and form of import duties", that in the case of the chemical industry, in which the American valuation is the very life of the tariff which protects the industry, if the proposed language shall be left in the bill it will be easy enough to change the valuation to the foreign valuation and absolutely and entirely destroy the chemical industry.

In addition to that, there may be taken the classification rule which before was protected by a recommendation of the Tariff Commission, which protection is now all gone, and it will be found that under that rule the President may, by a stroke of the pen in a contract with a foreign nation, take a classification which now has a duty of 80 percent and change it to one that has a rate of only 40 percent, or 20 percent, or 10 percent, and then he may go on after that with his other various schemes of reduction.

In addition to all that, as I have called to the attention of the Senate, he may take cigars coming from Cuba, which now have a tariff rate on them and which also pay an internal-revenue tax, and he may reduce the tariff just as I have explained.

In addition to that, he may wipe off entirely the tax on imports which now have an internal tax.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I submit a unanimous-consent request, which I hope may be agreed to. The request is that beginning on Monday at 3 o'clock there shall be a limitation of debate, and that after 3 o'clock on that day no Senator shall speak longer than 20 minutes on the bill or 15 minutes on any amendment, and that no Senator shall speak more than once on the bill or on any amendment.

I may say to the Senator from Oregon that I understand the speeches on the other side are about exhausted. There should be ample time before the limitation of debate begins; and even after that, as requests come in, any Senator would have at least 35 minutes to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall have to object to that proposal. I desire to assure the Senator from Mississippi, in charge of the bill, that the speeches have not been exhausted. Other Senators are to speak. I feel that ample opportunity has not been given, nor could it be given under the Senator's proposal, for an adequate and full discussion of the unfinished business.

I am willing to consider a proposal that there be a limitation on speeches of 20 minutes on the bill and 15 minutes on amendments commencing at 2 o'clock on Wednesday, provided the hours of the daily sessions shall be reasonable, the Senate meeting not earlier than 11 o'clock and continuing in session not later than 5:30.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say that, of course, I want every Senator to have an opportunity to discuss the bill if he desires to do so, and I have no disposition to try to bring the Senate here at an earlier hour than is convenient, or to keep the Senate in session to an unduly late hour. It seems to me, however, that putting off the limitation of debate until 2 o'clock Wednesday is quite too long.

Mr. McNARY. It is possible that debate on the bill will exhaust itself earlier. Then, of course, the bill will be read, but I wish to have sufficient time allotted to enable some absent Senators to discuss the measure. I think that is a very reasonable suggestion.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator agree to begin the limitation of debate at 5 o'clock on Tuesday? I am willing to make it 5 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. McNARY. I should very much prefer my own proposal. I think I might consider 12 o'clock on Wednesday.

Mr. HARRISON. I am willing to accept the proposal of the Senator if we can get an agreement that after 12 o'clock on Wednesday the debate shall be limited as suggested.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware has the floor. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. There is only one amendment which would prevent me from agreeing to the proposal which has been made. I have been asked by other Senators who are not in the Chamber, who have gone home, to say that on the agricultural amendment they do not desire to be limited in their discussion, the agricultural amendment being the one asking the exclusion of the authority as to agricultural products. Two Senators have stated to me that they want no limitation on the discussion of that amendment. If that amendment can be excluded from the terms of the agreement, I do not think there will be any objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, we cannot get anywhere if any amendment is excluded, because then we shall have no agreement with respect to limitation of debate.

Mr. McNARY. Let me suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that perhaps he would be satisfied with a limitation of 30 minutes on the agricultural amendment.

Mr. LONG. I do not suppose I am violating any confidence in stating that the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] thinks he will require in excess of an hour to discuss the agricultural amendment. The same thing is true with respect to my colleague [Mr. OVERTON], who has not discussed the bill at all.

Mr. HARRISON. I am willing to make an exception, that, with respect to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], they may each be given an hour on the agricultural amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may we not have it understood that there shall be no limitation of debate on this one amendment, the agricultural amendment?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, so far as that proposition is concerned, I should be forced to object to it. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has made at least two or three speeches here in his own time, and two or three other speeches in other Senators' time, in the course of this debate; and I see no reason why an exception should be made in behalf of the Senator from Louisiana. I am perfectly willing, in behalf of the Senator from Idaho, or the junior Senator from Louisiana, who has not delayed the Senate in this matter, to make an exception, as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi; but opening up the gate in accordance with the suggestion of the senior Senator from Louisiana would amount to no limitation of debate whatever.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Mississippi agree to make an exception in the case of agricultural and horticultural products—not with respect to any one Senator but generally—that there shall be a limitation of 1 hour?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not think we would get anywhere with such an agreement, so I withdraw my request.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, before the Senator from Mississippi withdraws his request——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator from West Virginia will permit me to make a further statement, I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion that the limitation of debate start at 12 o'clock on Wednesday, and that the limitation shall be 15 minutes on any amendment and 20 minutes on the bill, and that each Senator shall be confined to one speech on the bill and one speech on each amendment, with the further exception that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] shall be given 1 hour to speak on the agricultural amendment, and that the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] shall be given the same time. I think that is perfectly fair.

Mr. McNARY. I should want to add to that the amendment of the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. HARRISON. I am willing to give him 1 hour.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I think I should be given credit for trying to expedite the bill, which I do not suppose I will by some. I might suggest that it is very hard to say which Senators shall speak. We have tried that several times and never gotten anywhere. For instance, I have spoken on the bill in my own time only some 2 hours, I think—not to exceed that. It is true I have interrupted Senators, as has the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not interrupted much.

Mr. LONG. Nor have I interrupted very much. I have spoken very little, taking it all in all, except for the time I have taken out of other Senators' time. I have done it purposely so that it might not be charged against me that I am filibustering. It is difficult to pick out which Senators shall be permitted to speak.

There is a peculiar reason why the agricultural amendment should be exempted. Perhaps at a later date we can reach an agreement on that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, I should like to submit this unanimous-consent request, that the limitation of 15 minutes on each amendment and 20 minutes on the bill shall be applied to all other amendments, but that so far as the agricultural amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is concerned, the limitation shall be 1 hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. The amendment has not been offered by the Senator from California. There are three amendments, one by the Senator from Rhode Island, one by the junior Senator from Louisiana, and one by the Senator from California. That is why I think we had better except the agricultural amendments. I think those three Senators can probably get together and combine their amendments in one.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am privileged to speak for the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and to say that he would be very well satisfied with the arrangement proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from California would be willing to accept a 1-hour limitation on his amendment?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That refers only to the amendment of the Senator from California?

Mr. McNARY. No; to all agricultural amendments.

Mr. LONG. I am going to accept that, although I think Louisiana is the chief agricultural State which is to be put out of business. I am not going to object to that arrangement. Louisiana being a sugar State, everything is being directed against us. My understanding is that the arrangement will be effective Wednesday beginning at 2 o'clock. Is that correct?

Mr. McNARY. Wednesday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. LONG. I understand that beginning Wednesday at 12 o'clock the bill shall be disposed of in the following manner: All debate on each amendment shall be limited to 15 minutes and on the bill to 20 minutes to each Senator, with the exception of the amendments relating to agricultural products. Whose amendments?

Mr. HARRISON. The Johnson amendment.

Mr. LONG. The junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] has an amendment. I do not know whether or not the Johnson amendment is as good as the Overton amendment.

Mr. McNARY. They are precisely alike.

Mr. LONG. We included wool in ours. We are trying to get a few more votes! [Laughter.] Let us provide that the agreement shall apply to agricultural amendments, including wool, whether it is the amendment of the Senator from California or the Senator from Louisiana or the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HARRISON. Everybody knows what "agricultural amendments" mean.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, under the agreement now proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, there is permitted to every Senator, after 12 o'clock noon on next Wednesday, an hour and 35 minutes for debate. The proposal of the Senator from Louisiana would add 2 hours of debate for each Senator on the bill in addition to the hour and 35 minutes already agreed to. It is simply a vehicle for a filibuster.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent proposal of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LONG. Yes; I object.

Mr. HARRISON subsequently said: Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Following some conferences with the Senator from Oregon, the Senator from Louisiana and others, I desire to submit again a request for unanimous consent that beginning on Wednesday at 12 o'clock, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon any amendment, or more than once or longer than 20 minutes on the bill, with the exception of the agricultural amendment which has been offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], as to which the limitation shall be 1 hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, do I understand that under the proposed agreement a Senator will be permitted to speak for an hour on the Johnson amendment and another hour on the Overton amendment?

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no!

Mr. HARRISON. No.

Mr. CLARK. For instance, would the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who has already spoken three times, be permitted to speak for an hour on the Johnson amendment, and then for another hour on the Overton amendment?

Mr. McNARY. No, indeed. The exception applies to the agricultural amendment. There are two such amendments.

Mr. CLARK. I think it should be specified that if a Senator speaks on one of those amendments for an hour, he shall not be permitted to speak on the other amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not the desire that a Senator shall be permitted to speak more than an hour on either of those amendments.

Mr. LONG. That is it.

Mr. HARRISON. So I shall eliminate the names of the two Senators and just say "the agricultural amendment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK. Do I understand that a Senator will not be permitted to speak oftener than once nor longer than an hour on either or both of the Johnson-Overton amendments?

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

Mr. McNARY. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, so that we may have that understood, the Senator from Mississippi has the agreement in writing, and I do not think any changes at all have been made in it. If the Senator will send it up to the desk, he will have it altogether.

Mr. HARRISON. I think what I have stated in the motion is exactly as read.

Mr. LONG. Yes; it is.

Mr. HARRISON. This writing reads:

That this bill shall be disposed of in the manner that beginning at 12 o'clock noon Wednesday, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 15 minutes on any amendment, nor longer than 20 minutes nor more than once on the bill, except that on the amendment relating to agricultural products no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 1 hour.

Mr. LONG. That is right.

Mr. CLARK. That is on all the amendments?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator from Delaware desire to proceed further this evening? I am perfectly willing to agree to whatever he may desire to do. If he wishes to proceed with his speech this evening, we will remain and listen to him.

Mr. HASTINGS. That would be more than the Senator has been doing.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator desires to proceed tomorrow and that we recess at this time, we can take a recess, or we can go over until Monday. We have had an extremely hard week, meeting at 11 o'clock in the morning, and I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall take a recess until Monday.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest that we take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow, when the Senator from Delaware may conclude his remarks.

Mr. LONG. Did I understand the Senator to suggest that we take a recess until tomorrow? I thought we were to have Saturday off.

Mr. LEWIS. Not if the Senator from Louisiana is present. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. I shall not be present.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that we now take a recess until tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. It is desired that there be an executive session.

Mr. McNARY. Let us have the understanding, then, that we will take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

During the delivery of the speech of Mr. HASTINGS,

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to have the attention of the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. I may not be able to get his attention later, but I see he is in the Chamber just at this moment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I will give my attention to him in just a moment.

Mr. LONG. I am going to send to the desk a letter and ask that it be read. The letter is from the vice president of the National Wool Growers' Association and it deals with an official communication issued by that organization. I am going to send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, with the permission of the able Senator from Louisiana, may I ask that the reading be postponed for about 5 minutes?

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. LONG subsequently said: Mr. President, I should like now to have read, in the presence of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] the letter to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

WILLARD HOTEL,
Washington, D.C., May 17, 1934.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The woolgrowers of the country naturally have been deeply concerned over the proposed amendments to the tariff act as included in H.R. 8687.

Statements and testimony by the Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of State, and the Chairman of the Tariff Commission have given us grounds to expect that duties on imported wools may be reduced when the pending bill becomes law.

An article appearing in the San Angelo (Tex.) Morning Times of May 11 attributes to you a statement which would be very reassuring to us. This article quotes you as saying, "No woolgrower need fear the administration of the tariff-bargaining authority." A copy of this article is attached.

Since we have not seen this statement elsewhere, we respectfully inquire as to whether it is authentic and expresses your views and policies.

I expect to be in Washington, at the Willard Hotel, until May 22. Thereafter I shall be at my home in San Angelo, Tex.

Yours respectfully,

E. S. MAYER,
Vice President National Wool Growers Association.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, my purpose in asking my friend from Wyoming to listen to this letter is that it was sent to the White House on the 17th day of May; and if the wool growers could get an official communication from the White House in answer to it, which I am sure my friend from Wyoming might be of material assistance in securing, it would be highly appreciated. They have asked me to bring the matter to his attention.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana is very skillful in building his fires. I send to the desk a communication which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the communication will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

MAY 25, 1934.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATORS: Following our conversation in my office last Wednesday, I asked the wool and mohair advisory committee of the Farm Credit Administration to make a survey of the wool situation.

On the basis of the information available, it reports that wool is in a much stronger statistical position now than a year ago, or at any time during the past several years. American stocks of raw wools were substantially lower on January 1, 1934, than on January 1, 1933, and stocks of wool in secondary markets of the world are not considered burdensome. Furthermore, in view of the present price differential, the foreign wool situation is beneficial rather than detrimental to the American wool market at this time.

Domestic consumption of wools continues to exceed domestic production. While a weak undertone in present wool values is reported, I am advised that this is due largely to a lack of demand, occasioned by the fact that there still is a sizable accumulation of wool in various stages of manufacture which has not yet reached its final destination and to seasonal conditions.

There is nothing in the statistical position of domestic wool, either the remainder of the 1933 clip or the prospective clip for 1934, to indicate lower values. I am advised by the wool and mohair advisory committee that these views are shaded by those in the trade whose judgment is recognized as reliable.

The unsold wools of the 1933 clip, held under the so-called "wool marketing plan" of the Farm Credit Administration, represent a relatively small proportion of the total tonnage of wools consigned under the plan. There has been no change in the established policy of the Farm Credit Administration with reference to the marketing of wool in which its agencies have a financial interest, regarding which I made the following statement at the time the 1934 marketing plan was announced:

"Wools handled under the Administration's marketing plan will continue to be marketed in an orderly manner in response to consumptive demand. The price of wool during the 1934 season will be determined by fundamental factors of supply and demand. Following the institution of the plan for the handling of the 1933 clip, prices of grease wool in the country advanced sharply and wool continued to rise throughout the greater part of the season. With wool at present values, a rise of no such proportions this year is anticipated. Nevertheless, the plan should assure the industry a much firmer price foundation than might otherwise exist without it. It is not an effort to control prices but one to try to prevent unnecessary fluctuations."

Very truly yours,

W. I. MYERS, Governor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, Mr. H. B. Embach, chairman of the Wool and Mohair Advisory Committee, on May 23 issued this statement:

After a careful study of the present situation in the wool market, and with due consideration of the interests of the woolgrower, the manufacturer, the wool trade, and the consumer, the Wool and Mohair Advisory Committee feels that there is nothing in the present quietness of the market that would justify any change in present quoted wool values.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, that does not give us any information that we think will do us any good. That is simply what I should consider another nice, balmy letter, and I congratulate my friend from Wyoming on getting it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I doubt if the Senator from Louisiana desires any information that would do him any good.

Mr. LONG. What we want, to put it in good, turkey-talking language, is this: We want the President to say that he is not going to reduce the tariff on wool. That is all we want him to say. If he will say that, that will help us. Nothing less than that will do us any good. Statistics do not mean anything. We have a book full of them.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that no more wool shall be pulled over our eyes in this tariff debate. [Laughter.]

EXECUTIVE SESSION

After the conclusion of the speech of Mr. HASTINGS,

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Regular Army and general officers in the National Guard.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). The reports will be placed on the calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

THE CALENDAR—TREATIES AND NOMINATION PASSED OVER

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the first treaty on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The treaties on the calendar will go over, without objection, and also the nomination of Daniel D. Moore to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Louisiana.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Leon Dominian to be secretary in the Diplomatic Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Herman Oliphant to be General Counsel for the Department of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk read sundry nominations for promotions in the Marine Corps.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Marine Corps be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire what became of the nomination of Daniel D. Moore to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Louisiana?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination went over.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there was a matter the Senator from Massachusetts was anxious to have taken up, but he is not in the Chamber at the moment.

RECESS

Mr. LEWIS. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 3 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Saturday, May 26, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 25 (legislative day of May 10), 1934

SENATE

SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1934

(Legislative day of Thursday, May 10, 1934)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Friday, May 25, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Kean	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Davis	King	Russell

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], who are necessarily detained on public business. I regret to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] is still detained from the Senate because of illness.

Mr. HEBERT. I announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] are necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REPORT OF FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of operations of the Corporation for the period ended March 31, 1934, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PROPOSED CHILD-LABOR AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, which, with his accompanying certificate relative to the ratification by Pennsylvania of the proposed amendment to the Constitution regarding labor of persons under 18 years of age, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Harrisburg, May 24, 1934.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D.C.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith my certificate of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD J. BEAMISH,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

IN THE NAME AND BY AUTHORITY OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

To the honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

I, Richard J. Beamish, secretary of the Commonwealth, of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and keeper of the great seal thereof, do hereby certify that the following is a full, true, and correct copy of the act of the general assembly, entitled "A joint resolution approving the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the labor of persons under 18 years of age":

"SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in general assembly met, That the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing as follows:

"'SECTION 1. The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

"'SEC. 2. The power of the several States is unimpaired by this article, except that the operation of State laws shall be suspended to the extent necessary to give effect to legislation enacted by the Congress', is hereby ratified by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

"Be it further resolved, That a certified copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of State for the United States, in accordance with section 205 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and also to the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives."

E. C. SHANNON,
President of the Senate.
GROVER C. TALBOT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved the 22d day of December, A.D. 1933.

GIFFORD PINCHOT.

In witness whereof I have hereto attached my hand and the great seal of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania this 23d day of May, A.D. 1934.

[SEAL]

RICHARD J. BEAMISH,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 6462) to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1182) thereon.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 8919) to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1183) thereon.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the bill (S. 2926) to equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees, to encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between employers and employees, to create a National Labor Board, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1184) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 432. An act for the relief of Albert Lawrence Sliney (Rept. No. 1186); and

S. 433. An act directing the retirement of acting assistant surgeons of the United States Navy at the age of 64 years (Rept. No. 1187).

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2700) for the relief of William H. Rouncevill, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1188) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3678) for the relief of Miles Thomas Barrett, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1185) thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3655) to amend the act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes", approved June 30, 1906, as amended, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1189) thereon.

INVESTIGATION OF SO-CALLED "BOOK TRUST"

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 243) appointing a special committee to investigate certain charges against textbook concerns in connection with the obtaining of contracts for the sale of school books, reported it without amendment and moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported favorably the nomination of John Ward Studebaker, of Iowa, to be Commissioner of Education, vice George F. Zook.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H.R. 9046) to discontinue administrative furloughs in the Postal Service be taken from the calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for further consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEVELOPMENT OF INDIAN RESOURCES, ETC.—AMENDMENTS

Mr. ASHURST and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (S. 3645) to conserve and develop Indian lands and resources; to establish a credit system for Indians; to provide for higher education for Indians; to extend toward Indians the right to form business and other organizations; and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. JOHNSON each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. HALE and Mr. HATFIELD jointly submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. BULOW submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 249), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized during the Seventy-third Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

IMMIGRATION—STATEMENT BY WILLIAM C. HUSHING

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for the RECORD a statement on the subject of immigration made before the House Committee on Immigration on April 9, 1934, by William C. Hushing, national legislative representative and general organizer of the American Federation of Labor.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, my name is W. C. Hushing, national legislative representative of the American Federation of Labor. Statements were made here yesterday by two witnesses to the effect that the American Federation of Labor was represented on this famous Ellis Island committtee. That is not true. It may be that someone affiliated with one of our organizations sat on that committee, but, if so, he was unauthorized. No State federation of labor or central body has any right to speak for the American Federation of Labor on immigration questions.

Immigration is a matter that is passed upon by our conventions, and none of our subordinate bodies have any right whatsoever to represent the federation in regard to immigration.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Hushing, do you recall the names of those given by the witnesses yesterday as having authority to represent the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. HUSHING. I asked the witnesses and was given the name of only one. I believe his name was Sinnegan, but I could not find out who the other was.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. We are trying to clear up the matter on account of a representation made that labor was represented on the committee.

Mr. HUSHING. Neither Mr. Green nor any officer of the American Federation of Labor was asked to detail anyone to act for the federation on that Ellis Island committee. There was not a chance for us to be on it. We have heard a lot about that being this "impartial" committee. I do not want to reflect upon the committee in any way as to its standing, but I am of the opinion, and other officials of the federation are of the opinion, that the 48 members were picked because of their peculiar leanings on this subject, and, of course, we would not have had a chance to get on that sort of a committee.

Now, in the Washington News on May 7, 1934, an article appeared in regard to the five pending bills. As the chairman of the committee is quoted in this newspaper article, I suppose it is a release from his office, although I am not certain as to that. But in that article it calls these bills "the administration's immigration program."

Last September, and continuing up to December, Mr. Green had correspondence with the President of the United States in regard to this very subject. I am going to read the correspondence which is quite brief. If these five bills are administration bills it is news to us, and the President has reversed himself on this matter.

Under date of September 22, 1933, Mr. Green addressed the following letter to the President of the United States [reading]:

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President, White House, Washington, D.C.

SIR: From reports printed in the newspapers and confirmed by me you have been urged to revise the Executive order issued by President Hoover in 1930 to minimize the number of immigrants coming into this country to work. This order provided that no immigrant who would become a public charge could enter the country.

When that order was issued there were only about 5,000,000 unemployed in the United States. Now, although the National Recovery Act has been in existence since June 16 there are still 11,000,000 unemployed.

I cannot believe that the request made of you to cancel the order will have any influence on you. But I believe it is my duty to inform you that the American Federation of Labor desires the order to be continued until we can have it enacted into law by Congress. Those who favor unrestricted immigration are blind to the fact that the more immigrants who come into the country the more unemployment there will be. Immigration is a domestic question and no country has a right to object to any action taken by the United States to protect its own nationals.

Therefore, I appeal to you to permit the Executive order to stand. I ask this in the name of the 11,000,000 unemployed now in the United States.

Yours very truly,

WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

The President's reply to Mr. Green under date of December 8, 1933, is as follows [reading]:

WILLIAM GREEN, Esq.,
President American Federation of Labor, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. GREEN: I have referred your letter of September 22d to the Secretary of Labor, and enclose a copy of the report submitted to me which confirms my own understanding that there is no present proposal for relaxation of the restrictions on immigration, except such as have been made in favor of religious and political refugees.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The memorandum furnished by the Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins, through the President of the United States, is as follows [reading]:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C.

Memorandum to the President:

Referring to the letter of Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, dated September 22, 1933, relative to maintaining the present restrictions on immigration:

1. The action of the last administration mentioned by Mr. Green did not take the form of an Executive order, but of a press release by President Hoover describing the measures which were taken by the Department of State to enforce the l.p.c. (likely to become a public charge) clause of the immigration law.

2. No proposal has been made by this Department nor has any come to the attention of the Department to remove these restrictions at the present time.

3. A number of petitions have been received urging the relaxation of these restrictions in the case of political and religious refugees and this matter has been studied in the Departments of State and Labor, but no conclusion has been reached up to the present.

Aside from such relief as might be granted the classes referred to in the preceding paragraph, who, however, will be so numerically small as to be unimportant, it is believed that our present unemployment situation demands that the policy of continued restriction of immigration should be maintained by the Government for the present.

FRANCES PERKINS, Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, pursuing this question further, as to whether these are administration bills, three particularly good friends of the American Federation of Labor introduced four of these bills that are now under consideration. When I saw their names on those bills I was horrified, and immediately endeavored to contact them. Mr. SCHULTE and Mr. CROWE are in Indiana endeavoring to be renominated. I understand Mr. SCHULTE has been renominated, although I am not informed as to Mr. CROWE. I did contact Congressman WEIDEMAN, and he informs me that you handed him the bills which he introduced and advised him that they were administration bills.

This question occurs to me: Has the President informed you that these are administration bills? Has he changed his mind and gone back on the word he gave to Mr. Green?

The CHAIRMAN. I think you are begging the question. All you are asked to do is to make your statement. I do not want to get into any colloquy with you or any other witness, and if you desire some information I should be glad to sit down with you and talk to you. I do not think it is fair to discuss it in this record. I should be glad to hear you, but I do not think it is the duty of a witness to propound questions to any Member and demand an answer from him.

Mr. HUSHING. You well know the attitude of the American Federation of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. I do; and, so far as I am concerned, I believe I am a friend of the American Federation of Labor, and have been, but I do not want to get into a discussion as to my friendship for this or the other thing. I am here to perform my duty as I see it.

Mr. HUSHING. Exactly. Our attitude is this. We stand by our friends. We think you misled our friends in this instance. I called Mr. SCHULTE'S attention to this matter by long-distance telephone last night, and while I was not present when it was done, I understand that he today withdrew his bill by telegram to you.

I am advised that Mr. CROWE never saw the bill he introduced, and that had he known what was in it, he never would have introduced it.

As I say, those men are out trying to be renominated, and the federation is their friend, and wants to protect them all that is possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hushing, I think your statement is absolutely unfair and unjust to me and to these men about whom you are talking.

Mr. HUSHING. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is anything in your mind which you want from me, you can get it. I do not think it is fair for you to make a statement that I have attempted to misconstrue or deceive anybody, because, so far as I am concerned, I have no axes to grind with anybody, and have no one in whom I am interested, nor are the members of the committee interested as to whom any of the bills affect.

The Chair was given the information that these bills were administration bills, for the gentleman's information. And the chairman took the word of people in authority who gave him that, and based upon that fact the chairman conveyed that information to the rest of his colleagues. That is all there is to the whole proposition.

Mr. HUSHING. These may be Labor Department bills, but in my opinion they are not administration bills.

The CHAIRMAN. I made my answer to you direct.

Mr. DIES. We can get that cleared up by getting the President to send down a letter saying positively one way or the other. There have been a good many letters sent down.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. To clear the record at this point, it is my understanding that these were administration bills. I want Mr. Hushing to understand my attitude and Mr. SCHULTE'S, and Mr. CROWE'S; and I think you do.

Mr. HUSHING. There is no particular organization going to dictate to the members of the committee. We have certain fundamental things which we agree should be done or should not be done; and I for one would not violate my concept that the American worker should be protected; and I am in favor of protecting them always, and so are the other two gentlemen you mentioned. We have got enough unemployment in this country at this time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think anything that the witness may say in that respect would disabuse any misapprehension which anybody has had, whether a witness preceding him or a witness that may come after him, and some member of the committee may be laboring under the impression that these were administration bills and that they had the endorsement of this administration; and I think it is a proper statement, within certain bounds, of course.

Mr. DIES. It all depends on what is meant by administration. If you mean the Secretary of Labor is the administration, that is one thing.

Mr. HUSHING. When you refer to the "administration", Mr. DIES, you know you mean the President.

Mr. DIES. That is what I say. Insofar as the Secretary of Labor is concerned, I believe the Secretary of Labor favors these bills.

Mr. HUSHING. You know, as well as I do, that when an official comes down here or anyone says, "the President or the administration is supposed to be behind something", that it helps greatly.

Mr. DIES. That is true, but I have tried to find out on several occasions if the President favored these bills, and I was to be informed directly whether he favored them, and to this day I have not received any communication from the President that he favors these bills.

Mr. HUSHING. While we are on the subject of the bill of Mr. CROWE, there was another bill introduced in place of it.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to state to the gentleman representing the American Federation of Labor that in my time and experience on this committee, when bills are sent down from the Department of Labor or the Department of State, not prepared by any individual member, no active part taken by any individual member, and they come to the Chair's attention, the fact that the Department wants them, to my mind causes me to consider them as administration measures, and so I have construed them, and the very thing which I am telling you now I have told the members of my committee. And the gentleman is not justified in making any aspersions that I tried in any way to sell a bill of goods to any member, because it was not necessary. I could have stuck in all the bills, or any member could have stuck in all the bills. If the gentleman does not agree on that point, I may be wrong. You might construe "administration bills" as coming direct from the White House. I would construe them as such coming from the Departments.

Mr. DIES. The inference was that the President favored these bills.

Mr. HUSHING. When I have a letter in my possession like he wrote to Mr. Green, naturally I thought there was a misunderstanding or misrepresentation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Hushing, if these bills were enacted into law, would you, speaking for the Federation, consider it as a reversal of the administration's policy, as indicated in that letter of the President?

Mr. HUSHING. Certainly. These bills would throw the doors of immigration wide open to relatives, and then, further than that, would permit alien visitors, students, political refugees, and the hundreds of thousands of aliens admitted temporarily without any numerical limitation to remain permanently in this country on easy conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you be good enough to proceed along with any other statement that you wish to make?

Mr. HUSHING. I started to say something about the Crowe bill, which I might as well finish. I do not see any necessity for a new bill to be introduced in place of the Crowe bill, such as you introduced, because the only change in the bill, as I understand it, is that it strikes off the Philippines, which could have been done in committee as well.

Knowing that Mr. CROWE had never seen the bill, I thought there was something funny in that connection.

I just want to make one more remark in connection with this subject. If I felt that you did that deliberately, you were doing something most horrifying to me against colleagues of yourself, because we were to furnish those men with letters for their campaign. We have gone into the primaries, too, for the first time, and we are supporting our friends not only by letter but by telegram.

Mr. CROWE might have missed out getting nominated because of this bill. I understand he had a stiff race.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will just be patient and take it easy, I want to assure the gentleman—and I repeat my statement to you, whether you represent the American Federation of Labor, or any other organization—that I have no axes to grind with the American Federation of Labor. I have been their friend, as far as I can go, in listening to their requests. I assure the gentleman that no deception was practiced upon any Members who introduced any bills in this committee, and that the Chair had absolutely nothing to do with that question at all; that the chairman was not even here at the time these bills were introduced. I do not want to go into any further discussion with regard to conversations with some of these gentlemen you mentioned, because I do not think it is fair to them. If the gentleman wants to get more information on that, I should be glad to give it.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, do you think it is in point, inasmuch as every bill passed by Congress goes through the same situation, namely, that someone makes a strenuous statement; that the President wants this or wants that; and I am very glad to have this clarified for my part, and I think a great many of the Democrats will be glad, too. I think it is time well spent and a valuable service to clean that up so that we won't go over and say that the President wants these bills.

Mr. HUSHING. I will insert as part of my statement a telegram which I received this morning from Mr. SCHULTE, in which he mentions these bills and says he wants no part in it.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Do you have a telegram from Mr. CROWE, too?

Mr. HUSHING. No, sir; I was unable to contact Mr. CROWE, but I talked to his secretary, as I advised you awhile ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hushing, will you sit right there and let Colonel MacCormack make a statement?

Statement of Daniel W. MacCormack, Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, intervening, in which MacCormack admits he wrote the memorandum signed by Secretary Perkins and transmitted by the President to Mr. Green that there had been no relaxations in restriction except as to some refugees and that these bills were not to be considered administration bills but merely "on their merits."

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM C. HUSHING, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATIVE AND GENERAL ORGANIZER, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR—CONTINUED

Mr. HUSHING. What you say about considering the bills "on their merits" is exactly right.

But I want to say something in reply to Colonel MacCormack. These are immigration bills, or at least H.R. 9365 is an immigration bill. It does increase immigration. It violates the memorandum of the Secretary of Labor and the letter of the President. It admits the stepchild, the husbands of citizens, the mother, and the father over 60 years of age. It would increase immigration. There are no "ifs", ands", or "buts" about it's increasing immigration.

Now, there remain four other bills, Mr. DICKSTEIN'S bill H.R. 9518, which supersedes Mr. CROWE'S bill, repeals section 19 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, and places in the hands of the Secretary of Labor a great deal of discretionary power. It gives the Secretary of Labor authority that, in our opinion, no one person should have.

I am a great admirer of Frances Perkins. I think she is one of the most brilliant personalities I have ever met. In fact, in my opinion, she outshines some Members of Congress. And what I am going to say about her now is not a hang-over from our opposition to her as Secretary of Labor.

I think it would be especially unfortunate if she had this discretionary power, because I believe her leanings are toward the antirestriction of immigration, and that is the opinion of the federation.

What we want is not any opening up of the immigration doors. I think it is folly for this committee to be sitting here considering the reuniting of families when we have 10,902,000, according to our figures, now unemployed.

For every one that you take out of the quota a new-seed immigrant will come in—somebody capable of working and competing with an American citizen, or an alien already here—and they are the babies who get the jobs, because they work cheaper. Conditions that American workmen consider rotten here look very good to them, after they come from some of the foreign countries.

If you want to do something really constructive, report out a bill that will cut down the quotas, because they will be all filled as soon as business picks up a little; cut them down and take care of the near relatives in a bill restricting immigration.

I am as soft-hearted and sympathetic as anybody, and I look at this as a matter of human beings that are involved. I consider the human being, but the human being I consider is the American citizen first.

I think that is about all I have to say, except that I want to point out that somebody circulated a rumor to the effect that the federation favored these bills. I hope I have convinced you that we do not. It was even stated that Mr. Green would appear and support them. I do not know where the rumor came from, but there is no truth to it, and Mr. Green did not know anything about the bills until May 2.

Mr. DIES. Were these bills submitted to the American Federation of Labor here in Washington a couple of weeks ago?

Mr. HUSHING. No, sir. We get three copies of every bill introduced in Congress the next morning. We have three boxes over in the file room, and copies of all bills go in those boxes, and we send a messenger over for those bills, and these bills came to us in the ordinary course, and when they came over to Mr. Roberts' and my desks, we immediately took the matter up with Mr. Green, because I had heard rumors that the Federation was behind them, and I could not understand it, and he said no; that he had not seen the bills until we laid them on his desk, and that was May 2, 1 week after their introduction.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Hushing, this committee can take it, then, that your federation does not endorse the report of the Ellis Island Committee?

Mr. HUSHING. Positively not. We have not even been furnished a copy of the report.

Mr. FOCHT. You are against all these bills?

Mr. HUSHING. Yes, sir; we want these bills held up until you can do something for the people of this country by further restricting immigration, and at the same time you do that relatives can be taken care of.

Mr. DIES. My bill, no. 4114, would do that very thing by cutting immigration and providing that the relatives can come in under proper safeguards to reunite families.

Mr. HUSHING. Of course, your bill was acted on some time back, I believe March 12. By the way, the action on that bill was one reason why I did not take up these bills with the chairman of the committee, because in conference with me, Mr. Chairman, many times you informed me that you agreed with us in our restrictive immigration views, excepting as to the admission of aliens to reunite families.

The CHAIRMAN. You know my stand, and everybody in the country knows it. I think we ought to reunite the families.

Mr. HUSHING. We ought to have additional restriction.

The CHAIRMAN. We are all reasonable men, and we could sit around the table and find out how far you would go or any other organization would go.

Mr. HUSHING. You made those expressions of opinion to me unsolicited.

The CHAIRMAN. I certainly have.

Mr. HUSHING. And when you had an opportunity to go through with the thing you did not do so.

The CHAIRMAN. My dear friend, let us not get into any personal controversy as to that. I am still repeating what I told you, that I am for reuniting families, and I have been for it since coming to Congress.

Mr. HUSHING. You are entitled to that opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope I will not be charged with anything wrong about that.

Mr. HUSHING. Positively no; but, as I just said, you have informed me time and time again, without solicitation on my part, that you believed in restricted immigration.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. HUSHING. Exactly. When there is a bill in here to restrict immigration and take care of the relatives, you were not in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. I might be able to sit down and point out to you that it was not doing the things about which you are talking. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. HUSHING. My opinion was that you had not kept your word with me, and that is the reason I did not come to you personally about these bills.

The CHAIRMAN. My opinion of it is—and I will repeat again—that I will go along toward safeguarding this country as far as you or the American Federation of Labor will go, providing you sit down at a round table and discuss sensible legislation, such as will do the things that we ought to do in this country and not leave people under the fear of being picked up and arrested.

Is there anything further, Mr. Hushing?

Mr. HUSHING. I have told you our opinion on that. Yes; since we have got on the subject of restriction, there is an absolute necessity of restricting Mexican immigration.

Here are a few copies of petitions which we have received in the last few days on that subject [referring to file in possession of the witness].

We have had the matter up time and again with the Commissioner of Immigration, but we do not get any results, and we want something done along that line.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Hushing, in that connection, Mexican labor is drifting into the East right now. It is just wide open?

Mr. HUSHING. Into Chicago and all the steel mill centers, such as Pittsburgh, and other similar places.

I took the trouble to get a copy of the immigration laws of Mexico, and I will be glad to insert them in the record for the information of the committee. I want you to observe how they treat our workers who wish to enter their country. They are absolutely prohibited from entering, except in certain cases, and they can only remain a short time. I have copies of their laws which I will insert in the hearing.

Mr. DIES. Mexico is a little different from Canada. Canada has been pretty liberal with some of our workingmen, but in Mexico they do not let any of them go in now.

Mr. HUSHING. That is true; and the Canadian is a different kind of fellow, more like an American.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. We cannot have anybody go to Canada and work. They won't let a musician go over there to make a one-night stand.

Mr. HUSHING. That is all, so far as I am concerned.

The telegram previously referred to is as follows:

HAMMOND, IND., May 9, 1934.

WILLIAM C. HUSHING,

American Federation of Labor Building, Washington, D.C.:

WEIDEMAN introduced bill H.R. 9364 under my name, saying it had administration approval. Want no part of it.

WILLIAM T. SCHULTE.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

FOREIGN DEBTS

Mr. HASTINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to announce that at the conclusion of the address of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] upon the question of the tariff I shall take the liberty of addressing the Senate for a few moments touching the matter of the foreign debts.

PROMOTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN THE NAVY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it is very important that a bill pending on the calendar relating to midshipmen at the Naval Academy at Annapolis and the personnel of the Navy be passed today in order that the young men who are about to graduate may receive their commissions. Under existing law only one-half of the graduates would be commissioned. Last year only 50 percent of them were commissioned. There is on the calendar a bill which would repeal the law we enacted last year providing for this limitation and which would permit the commissioning of all the graduates this year who are duly qualified.

Because of that emergency I ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business and to consider—I think it will require only a few moments—Calendar No. 1229, the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield for that purpose?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, can the Senator from Massachusetts assure me that the bill will not lead to debate?

Mr. WALSH. I can assure the Senator it will not lead to debate; at least I feel very certain that it will not.

Mr. HASTINGS. With that assurance I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant, to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "Navy", to strike out "and the retirement of officers who are not on the promotion list or who are found not professionally qualified"; in line 9, after the word "lieutenant", to strike out "and the retirement of lieutenants and lieutenants (junior grade)"; in section 4, on page 2, line 19, to strike out:

For the purpose of extending section 3 of the act of March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1483; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 34, sec. 286a), to officers below the rank of lieutenant commander, the said section is amended so that the length of service therein prescribed shall be 14 years for lieutenants and 7 years for lieutenants (junior grade): Provided, That no officer of said rank shall become so ineligible prior to June 30 of the second calendar year following the date of this act: And provided further, That the restriction on the number of involuntary transfers in any fiscal year to the retired list prescribed in section 7 of the act of March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1484; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 34, sec. 286e), shall not apply to the grade of lieutenant and lieutenant (junior grade).

And to insert:

All officers of the grade of lieutenant who shall not have been recommended for promotion by the report of a line selection board, as approved by the President, prior to the completion of 14 years of commissioned service in the Navy computed in the manner prescribed in section 3 of the said act of March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1483; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 34, sec. 286a), shall be carried as additional numbers in the grade of lieutenant, but shall be included in the total authorized number of commissioned officers of the active list of the line of the Navy and of any grade to which later promoted.

And on page 4, line 4, after the words "prior to", to strike out "July 1, 1934, in accordance with this section" and to insert "August 1, 1934, by the President"; and in line 23, after the words "prior to", to strike out "June 1, 1934, in accordance with this section" and to insert "August 1, 1934, by the President", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That except as otherwise provided in this act, the provisions of existing law with reference to promotion by selection in the line of the Navy are hereby extended to include and authorize promotion to the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant. The number to be recommended for promotion to each such grade and to be placed upon the promotion list shall be furnished the selection board for that grade by the Secretary of the Navy and shall be the number of existing vacancies in the grade concerned plus such additional number, if any, as the needs of the service may require.

SEC. 2. That lieutenants (junior grade) who on June 30 of the year of the convening of the board shall have had 3 years' service in the grade of junior lieutenant shall be eligible for consideration for selection for promotion to the next higher grade.

SEC. 3. That the board for the recommendation of line officers for promotion to the grade of lieutenant commander and lieutenant shall consist of nine officers on the active list of the line of the Navy above the rank of commander, not restricted by law to the performance of shore duty only, at least one of whom shall be a rear admiral.

SEC. 4. That all officers of the grade of lieutenant who shall not have been recommended for promotion by the report of a line selection board as approved by the President prior to the completion of 14 years of commissioned service in the Navy computed in the manner prescribed in section 3 of the said act of March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1483; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 34, sec. 286a), shall be carried as additional numbers in the grade of lieutenant, but shall be included in the total authorized number of commissioned officers of the active list of the line of the Navy and of any grade to which later promoted.

SEC. 5. That section 1 of the act approved May 6, 1932 (47 Stat. 149; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 34, sec. 12), is hereby amended by inserting the word "hereafter" after the words "midshipmen who", and the words "Provided, That all former midshipmen graduated in 1933 who received a certificate of graduation and honorable discharge may, upon their own application, if physically qualified, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, be appointed as ensigns prior to August 1, 1934, by the President and shall take rank next after the junior ensign appointed in 1933 and among themselves in accordance with their proficiency as shown by the order of merit at date of graduation: And provided further," after the words "Naval Academy" and by striking out "in 1932, and at least 50 percent of all graduates in subsequent years: Provided", so that as amended the said section will read as follows:

"That the President of the United States is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy: Provided, That all former midshipmen graduated in 1933 who received a certificate of graduation and honorable discharge and whether they have since been married or not may, upon their own application, if physically qualified, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, be appointed as ensigns prior to August 1, 1934, by the President and shall take rank next after the junior ensign appointed in 1933 and among themselves in accordance with their proficiency as shown by the order of merit at date of graduation: And provided further, That the number of such officers so appointed shall, while in excess of the total number of line officers otherwise authorized by law, be considered in excess of the number of officers in the grade of ensign as determined by any computation, and shall be excluded from any computation made for the purpose of determining the authorized number of line officers in any grade on the active list above the grade of lieutenant (junior grade) until the total number of line officers shall have been reduced below the number otherwise authorized by law."

SEC. 6. That hereafter any staff officer on the active list below the rank of lieutenant commander shall be advanced to the next higher rank in his corps when the running mate of such staff officer or an officer junior to such running mate has been promoted to that higher rank in the line of the Navy or when a vacancy in that rank exists in the line of the Navy which will in due course be filled by the promotion of his running mate or an officer junior to his running mate: Provided, That such staff officer is found qualified in accordance with law for such advancement. The provisions of law relating to the advancement of staff officers now embodied in sections 255, 321, and 348r (supplement VII), of title 34, United States Code, are hereby amended in accordance with this section.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the bill has the approval of the Navy Department and of the administration; it has passed the House of Representatives and has been unanimously approved by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs. The House bill provided for the retirement of 600 naval officers. The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs struck out the retirement provision and inserted a provision to place the officers in what is known as "the extra numbers list" in the particular grade in which they are now commissioned. Therefore, I should like to have favorable action taken on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report on the bill submitted by the committee may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S.Rept. No. 1154, 73d Cong., 2d sess.]

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY AND APPOINTING GRADUATES OF THE NAVAL ACADEMY TO BE ENSIGNS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany H.R. 9068):

The bill H.R. 9068, which passed the House of Representatives, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, and the committee report favorably thereon with certain amendments and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill provides for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy to the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and to authorize the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of midshipmen who graduated from the Naval Academy in the class of 1933 and who received a certificate of graduation and an honorable discharge.

The present law provides for promotions in the Navy by selection to the grades of rear admiral, captain, and commander.

The House bill extends promotion by selection to additional grades, namely, lieutenant commander and lieutenant. The purpose of this provision in extending selection to the lower grades is to make it possible to promote officers in the line of the Navy to the grades above that of lieutenant at an age which will permit of their efficiently performing the duties of the grades.

Under the existing law officers are advanced to the grades above that of lieutenant at advanced ages, which makes them physically unable to perform the duties of the advanced grades and which does not permit of their having sufficient time in the higher grades to acquire essential experience before reaching the statutory retiring age. The reference to existing law refers to the present method of promotion by seniority in the lower grades of the Navy.

The House bill provides for the retirement of officers in the grades of lieutenant and lieutenant (junior grade), who are not selected for promotion.

This would result in the retirement of some 600 naval officers with the retirement pay to which they would be entitled by reason of their rank and years of service under the existing law.

The retirement of these officers not selected for promotion would make possible the promotion of younger officers, who, under existing law, cannot be promoted because of lack of vacancies, which has resulted in officers of advanced age remaining in the lower grades, and thereby seriously affecting the efficiency of the Navy.

The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs heartily approves of the extension of the selective system of promotion to the lower grades.

The selective system of promotion in the higher grades now in operation has undoubtedly contributed to the present high state of efficiency of the personnel in the higher grades.

The extension of this same system to the lower grades is certain to improve efficiency.

The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, however, does not believe that we should at the present time retire the number of officers who would be retired if the provisions of the House bill dealing with the retirements was retained.

Undoubtedly in the future it will be necessary to provide such retirements.

The amendments reported by the Senate committee practically all relate to the forced retirement of those officers who are not selected for promotion.

The first committee amendment, eliminating the language in section 1, relates to this forced retirement.

The language eliminated in section 4 also relates to forced retirement.

The committee reports a new section in place of section 4, as follows:

"All officers of the grade of lieutenant who shall not have been recommended for promotion by the report of a line selection board as approved by the President prior to the completion of 14 years of commissioned service in the Navy, computed in the manner prescribed in section 3 of the said act of March 3, 1931 (46 Stat., 1483; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 34, sec. 286a), shall be carried as additional numbers in the grade of lieutenant, but shall be included in the total authorized number of commissioned officers of the active list of the line of the Navy and of any grade to which later promoted."

The effect of this substitute language for the language stricken out is that instead of being placed upon the retired list, the officers in the rank of lieutenant who are not selected for promotion will be made extra numbers on the lieutenant's list instead of being placed upon the retired list, as under the provisions of section 4 of the House bill. These extra numbers will not be in excess of the total number of commissioned officers on the active list of the Navy.

The amendments to section 5, on page 3, line 16, and page 4, line 10, merely extend the time for appointment to the rank of ensign of midshipmen graduating in 1933 from June 1, 1934, to August 1, 1934. The reason for this is that it is practically impossible to accomplish the appointment of these ex-midshipmen by the date specified in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives.

The language inserted on page 3, line 16, "by the President", is for the purpose of making it possible to commission these graduates in advance of confirmation by the Senate, as the Senate may not be in session until August 1, 1934, when the date for making these appointments expires.

The law passed the 6th of May 1932 provided for the commissioning of not more than 50 percent of each class that graduated at the Naval Academy, commencing with the class of 1933. If this law is not modified or changed, not more than 50 percent of the midshipmen of the class of 1934 can be commissioned.

The House text, with which the Senate committee concurs, will provide for the commissioning as ensigns of midshipmen who graduated in 1933 and who were not commissioned and midshipmen who graduate in 1934 and in the future who upon graduation are fully qualified.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill, ask for a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. HALE conferees on part of the Senate.

PROMOTIONS IN THE MARINE CORPS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent also for the immediate consideration of a companion bill relating to the Marine Corps, being the bill (H.R. 6803) to regulate the distribution, promotion, retirement, and discharge of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter commissioned officers of the Marine Corps shall be distributed in grades, promoted, retired, and discharged in like manner and with the same relative conditions in all respects as are provided for commissioned officers of the line of the Navy by existing law or by laws hereafter enacted except as may be necessary to adapt the said provisions to the Marine Corps, or as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 2. That of the authorized number of commissioned officers above the grade of colonel one shall be the Major General Commandant, two-thirds shall be brigadier generals, and the remainder shall be major generals.

SEC. 3. That the heads of staff departments shall be general officers while so serving, in addition to the number of general officers otherwise herein provided, with the rank, pay, and allowances of brigadier generals. They shall be carried in the grades or ranks from which appointed.

SEC. 4. That promotion to major general of the line shall be from brigadier generals of the line.

SEC. 5. That in computing the number of colonels to be recommended for promotion or to be designated for retention on the active list the general officers of the line shall be considered as constituting the grade next above that of colonel.

SEC. 6. That commissioned service of officers for the purpose of this act shall consist of all commissioned service on the active list of the Marine Corps, whether under a temporary or permanent appointment, and all commissioned service on active duty in the Marine Corps Reserve and the National Naval Volunteers.

SEC. 7. That selection boards shall consist of not less than six officers on the active list of the Marine Corps, the composition and procedure of the boards to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That no officer shall be recommended for advancement unless he shall have received recommendation of not less than two-thirds of the members of the board.

SEC. 8. That administrative staff duty performed by any officer under appointment or detail, and duty in aviation, or in any technical specialty, shall be given weight by the selection board in determining his fitness for promotion equal to that given to line duty equally well performed.

SEC. 9. That section 1493, Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 34, sec. 665), is so far amended in its application to the Marine Corps as to require that no officer shall be promoted to a higher grade, excepting in the case provided in section 1494, Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 34, sec. 666), until he has been examined by a board of naval medical officers and pronounced physically fit to perform all his duties at sea and in the field.

SEC. 10. That the requirement of sea service in grade shall not apply to promotion of officers of the Marine Corps; and officers in the upper four-sevenths of the grades below brigadier general, subject to selection as established by the first section of this act, shall be eligible for consideration by selection boards and for promotion without regard to length of service in grade: Provided, That no officer of the Marine Corps shall be ineligible for consideration for promotion by reason of completion of length of commissioned service until he shall have been once considered by a selection board.

SEC. 11. That an officer whose name is placed on an eligible list for appointment as head of a staff department shall not be again considered for that office by any subsequent selection board, except as otherwise provided in this section, and shall, in respect to involuntary retirement, be in the same status as if on a promotion list: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, with the approval of the President, remove his name from such list and submit it to the next ensuing selection board for consideration and recommendation. If recommended for appointment by said board and approved by the President, the name of such officer shall be replaced on the eligible list from which removed without prejudice by reason of its having been temporarily removed therefrom. If not recommended by said board, such officer shall be subject to involuntary retirement under the same conditions as provided for in the case of an officer whose name is not on a promotion list.

SEC. 12. That for the purposes of distribution and promotion in the Marine Corps grade and rank shall be considered as meaning the same.

SEC. 13. That the Major General Commandant shall be appointed as now provided by law.

SEC. 14. That the selection board recommending colonels for promotion shall recommend the number of officers of the rank of colonel directed by the Secretary of the Navy for appointment as head of each staff department, and the names of officers so recommended, approved by the President, shall be placed on an eligible list for such appointment, one list for each department. As vacancies occur hereafter, heads of staff departments shall be appointed for 4 years from officers whose names appear on the eligible lists for the respective departments.

SEC. 15. That section 7 of the act of March 4, 1925 (43 Stat.L. 1272; U.S.C., title 34, secs. 624, 630, 663, 669, and 684), and all other laws and parts of laws, insofar as the same are inconsistent with, or in conflict with the provisions of this act, are, except as they apply to officers heretofore retired thereunder, hereby repealed.

SEC. 16. That officers of the Marine Corps in the ranks or grades of lieutenant colonel and major shall not be retired because of not being on a promotion list or on an eligible list for appointment as head of a staff department, and shall be eligible for consideration for promotion by selection boards without regard to completion of 28 and 21 years' commissioned service, respectively. Upon promotion or advancement after the approval of this act, with the exception of the Major General Commandant, heads of staff departments with the rank of brigadier general, an officer of the Marine Corps who may be appointed as Judge Advocate General of the Navy, and commissioned warrant officers, which officers shall receive the pay and allowances provided by law for their rank, commissioned officers of the Marine Corps shall receive the pay and allowances of the grade or rank from which promoted or advanced: Provided, That officers in the grades or ranks stated shall receive the pay and allowances of the grades or ranks in which serving upon attaining the number on the lineal lists of such grades or ranks, as follows: Major general, 2 (excluding the Major General Commandant); brigadier general, 6; colonel, 35 (common list); lieutenant colonel, 38 (common list); major, 80; captain, 256; first lieutenant, 224.

SEC. 17. Section 4 of the act approved February 28, 1925 (43 Stat.L. 1081; U.S.C., title 34, sec. 753), as amended, is hereby amended to the extent that, hereafter, the minimum age limit for enlistment in the Naval Reserve or the Marine Corps Reserve shall be the same as that for enlistment in the Regular Navy.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report submitted by the committee on the bill just passed may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 1175, 73d Cong., 2d sess.]

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS OF THE MARINE CORPS

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany H.R. 6803):

The Committee on Naval Affairs of the United States Senate, to whom was referred the bill (H.R. 6803) to regulate the distribution, promotion, retirement, and discharge of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill provides:

(a) For no increased cost over that which obtains at present.

(b) For no increase in the number of officers now authorized.

(c) For readjustment of the percentage distribution by grades, on the same basis as that now in force in the Navy.

(d) For promotion to first lieutenant after 3 years' commissioned service, as is done in the case of naval officers.

(e) For promotion by selection rather than by seniority.

(f) For boards to prepare eligible lists for appointment as heads of State staff departments and promotion lists for promotion to brigadier general of the line, colonel, and lieutenant colonel; and for the composition and procedure of such boards.

(g) For elimination by transfer to the retired list of colonels not selected for promotion, upon completion of 35 years of commissioned service, instead of at 56 years of age as at present.

(h) Against too great a number of retirements in any one year by restricting the number that may be retired.

(i) For the payment of officers transferred to the retired list for nonselection at the same rate as now provided by law.

The officer personnel of the Marine Corps is in a condition which has reached a critical stage because of stagnation of promotion and over-age. The present laws are ineffective and inefficient. As a result, the rate of promotion is the same for all officers without regard to the high efficiency of some and the comparative inefficiency of others. Marine officers are years behind their running mates in the Navy.

Sections 1 to 15 of the bill constitute a complete system, which will place the Marine Corps under Navy rather than Army personnel laws, which is sound and appropriate.

Section 1 is the basic section of the bill. It applies the Navy system to the Marine Corps by placing the commissioned personnel of the Marine Corps under the laws governing the line commissioned personnel of the Navy.

Sections 2 to 14, inclusive, contain the necessary provisions to adapt the Navy system to the Marine Corps. Section 15 provides for the necessary repeal of former conflicting laws and section 16 contains the economic provisions necessary to prevent any additional cost to the Government.

Section 17 is a provision which was inserted on the floor of the House of Representatives. It makes the enlistment age in the Marine Corps and the Naval Reserve the same as in the regular service, namely, 17 years. At the present time there is a year of inequality.

Section 2 provides that two-thirds of the general officers shall be brigadier generals and the remainder major generals, including the Major General Commandant. This continues the number of officers with the rank of major general as at present.

Section 3 provides that three heads of staff departments shall be brigadier generals while so serving as at present.

Section 4 provides that promotion to major general of the line shall be by selection by the President from brigadier generals of the line.

Section 5: This is purely a technical provision to adapt the Navy law to the Marine Corps. In the Navy there is only one grade above that of captain, which is rear admiral. In the Marine Corps there are two grades above the rank of colonel, which are major general and brigadier general, and in order to make Marine Corps computations on the same basis with the Navy, it is necessary to include these two grades in one. It is merely for a matter of computation.

Section 6: The purpose of this section is to adjust the Navy laws to the Marine Corps as far as computation of commissioned service is concerned, the Navy laws being based on the length of commissioned service.

Section 7: The Navy law provides that the selection boards shall consist of nine rear admirals. It would be impracticable for the Marine Corps to assemble nine general officers. This section provides that the selection board shall consist of not less than six officers on the active list of the Marine Corps the composition and procedure of the boards to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy. It further provides that no officer shall be recommended for advancement unless he receives the recommendation of not less than two-thirds of the members of the board. This also follows the Navy practice.

Section 8: This section insures that the selection of an officer for promotion shall not be jeopardized by reason of duty in a staff department, aviation, or other technical specialty.

Section 9: The only effect of this provision would be to require that the Marine officers, in addition to being able to perform all their duties at sea would be qualified to perform duty in the field, as much of the service of the Marine Corps is field duty.

Section 10: This proviso safeguards the interest of those officers who may complete sufficient commissioned service prior to reaching the upper four-sevenths of their respective grades, as to make them automatically ineligible for consideration for selection by reason of such service. Every officer will thus be eligible for consideration by at least one selection board in each grade before otherwise being considered ineligible by reason of length of commissioned service.

Section 11: Gives to officers whose names are placed on staff eligible lists the same right for retention on such lists as is given officers whose names appear on promotion lists of the line.

SECTION 12: This provision is to eliminate possible ambiguity regarding the words "grade" and "rank", which are used somewhat interchangeably in laws regarding distribution and promotion.

Section 13 provides that the Major General Commandant shall be appointed as now provided by law.

Section 14 provides for the preparation of eligible lists for appointment as heads of State staff departments in the same manner as line promotion lists are prepared, these lists to be prepared by the same board that selects colonels for promotion. The present practice of appointing heads of staff departments is continued.

Section 15 is a general repeal section.

Section 16: The purpose of this section is to eliminate all extra costs which would be incurred under preceding sections. The first sentence of this section limits involuntary retirements to colonels who have completed 35 years' commissioned service and are not selected for promotion. Under the present law colonels 56 years of age and not selected for promotion are retired. Lieutenant colonels and majors will not be involuntarily retired for nonselection and will be eligible for consideration for promotion notwithstanding the completion of 28 and 21 years' service, respectively, this variation from the Navy system also being for the purpose of preventing any increased expense. The remainder of section 16 is to prevent the cost of pay and allowances under the proposed redistribution in grades from exceeding the cost under the present distribution.

Section 17 makes the minimum age limit for enlistment in the Naval Reserve or the Marine Corps Reserve the same as that for enlistment in the Regular Navy.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, my attention has been called to the fact that the calendar has not copied the unanimous-consent agreement as it appears in the RECORD. I ask the Senator from Mississippi to look at the calendar and compare it with the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of today. I do not know why the change was made nor who made the change, but it is not according to what is in the RECORD.

The RECORD is perfectly clear, but the calendar is not. I refer to page 9604 of the RECORD. It reads:

> That this bill shall be disposed of in the manner that beginning at 12 o'clock noon Wednesday—

And so forth. The unanimous-consent agreement as printed on the calendar says:

> Ordered, by unanimous consent, That beginning at 12 o'clock noon Wednesday, May 30, 1934—

And so forth.

I do not know who is responsible for the change that has been made in the statement on the front page of the calendar; but may I ask the Chair which would control—the RECORD or the calendar?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am quite sure that both statements carry the same idea; but I ask that the next printing of the calendar comply with the form found in the RECORD, to save any further discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, just before the Senate recessed last evening I had begun to discuss the question of the amendment to the bill by the Finance Committee with respect to notice. But in view of the fact that my remarks were interrupted by the recess I asked the official reporters to omit what I had said with respect to notice, and I shall, therefore, repeat that portion of my remarks of yesterday.

The impression prevails that the Senate has amended the bill so as to give persons interested in a tariff rate an opportunity to be heard before it is decreased or increased. When Secretary Hull was before the Finance Committee it was impossible to get him to agree to any concession with respect to notice. I call attention to his testimony at this point as it appears on page 16 of the hearings, as follows:

> Secretary HULL. I will say this to the Senator: Over 100 commercial treaties have been negotiated. Many governments negotiate them exactly as this is proposed. Most governments negotiate them and put them into immediate operation, because the negotiator is a part of the parliamentary government that is in power, and that insures a favorable action. If we are to get anywhere in negotiating with these countries under the methods they have and are carrying out, free from objection so far as I have been able to learn, we cannot throw this wide open to every person that wants to come in and be heard. I will submit to the Senator's own judgment as to the extent to which we should go if we hope to make this practical in its operation.

Senator BARKLEY. As a practical matter of fact, if we write into the law a requirement that the President shall give a hearing to everybody who suspects that he is going to be affected by one of these trade agreements adversely, he will, of course, have to give a hearing to any other industry that might be beneficially affected by the agreement, and therefore it would result in a joint debate between two or more industries as to who was going to get the most advantage or disadvantage out of any agreement that was entered into.

Secretary HULL. That is the appeal that I am submitting to Senator COUZENS. It is an extremely difficult situation, and we are suppposed to grapple with it as best we can. Of course, the President and anybody associated with him in administering this law would have every reason to help every business and to treat it fairly rather than to injure it in the slightest, and that is the sole objective of this measure.

Senator HASTINGS. Mr. Secretary, isn't it your position that it would be impracticable to write any such thing in the bill?

Secretary HULL. I know, as the Senator from Kentucky suggested, that you would need two or three new Commerce Buildings to enable everybody to be heard. There would not be one-fifth enough lawyers in Washington to represent them.

Senator HASTINGS. Then it is impracticable?

Secretary HULL. It is impracticable. That is the point I make about it, and the last thing that the President would want to do would be to injure business. For that matter, there have been ample opportunities to crucify business under the flexible clause if those administering it had seen fit.

Then, again, on page 19, in answer to a question propounded by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], Secretary Hull said:

Well, that is the point I am trying to make.

Senator REED. But don't you think that the persons affected are entitled to be heard, to say whether that will or won't be the case?

Secretary HULL. The Senator, of course, is apparently seeking to load the bill up with an interminable set of machinery. I remember we commenced hearings on the Fordney Act in December 1920. It was enacted into a law in August 1922.

How far would we have gotten if we had been negotiating commercial trade agreements by that procedure? Of course, it is not practical. That is the situation.

The Secretary of State gave to the committee the distinct and definite impression that it was impractical to provide the giving of notice.

Some time after that testimony was given, and after it appeared that many members of the committee believed a notice was necessary, an amendment was proposed to the bill which is known as "section 4." I think it may be safely said that this amendment is so ineffective that it does not in any way change the position of the Secretary of State. The amendment is about as innocuous as could be written.

Suppose we take the last five lines of the amendment. I believe every person will agree they are just so much fröth. They read:

And before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce and from such other source as he may deem appropriate.

As Secretary Hull pointed out on page 20 of the hearings, he anticipated that such information would be sought, and by having all departments under the control of the Executive the information would be readily furnished. He said:

Now, we will have not only the Tariff Commission at our elbows on all of those things, under instructions to ransack every crack and crevice that contains information on the commercial side of any industry or business, but we will have the Department of Commerce and all of the other departments, the Agriculture Department, and others, that can shed any least light on this business situation.

But let us take the first part of the section that is supposed to have teeth in it and see how helpful it would be to the persons interested in tariff rates.

Briefly, it provides that before any trade agreements shall be concluded, public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President or to such agent as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

As an illustration, suppose the President is trying to make a trade agreement with France, and, as appears in the Senate hearings, France is a country which the State Department finds furnishes the chief source of supply of one or more commodities to the United States. In the list submitted there are included 84 articles of principal imports from that country, which in 1931 amounted to approximately $32,000,000. It clearly appears from the testimony offered on behalf of the State Department that the method that would necessarily have to be followed would be first to negotiate and have conversations with France with respect to the proposed agreement before it became necessary under this amendment "to give public notice of the intention to negotiate the agreement", because it would be impossible to tell beforehand whether it would be worth while to give such notice. It is only "before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded" that the public notice shall be given.

So the person negotiating such a treaty finds himself in the position of having first to ascertain what concessions it will be necessary to make to France in order to get France to increase certain exports from this country. The conversations and negotiations continue from day to day until the American representatives reach the best agreement that can be obtained. They reach an agreement that is satisfactory to the President, but the President says, "Before this foreign-trade agreement is concluded, public notice must be given", under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

This does not mean that before the foreign-trade agreement is concluded its terms and conditions are to be published broadcast. If the whole 84 items mentioned in the study made by the State Department are included, does that mean that each of the producers of the 84 articles in this country is to be served with some sort of a notice and is to be given an opportunity to be heard; or does it mean that public notice is to be given that an agreement is about to be negotiated with France, and all persons who are protected by a tariff on anything that comes from France will have to speculate on whether the article in which they may be interested is included in the list?

How is it to be determined who is an interested person under this provision? I assume that it means any person who is interested because of the change in the tariff rate by reason of making such an agreement; but in this provision the kind of public notice is in the discretion of the President, and the interested person is to be determined by the President. The opportunity to present his views is such opportunity as the President may think proper, and the rules and regulations are to be prescribed by the President.

This provision could be legally complied with by posting a notice on the door of the office of the Secretary of State to the effect that the Department was about to negotiate an agreement with a certain government, and that all persons interested would be heard at a certain place fixed in the notice. If complaint were made that this was not sufficient notice, the secrecy which was impressed upon the committee by the representatives of the Secretary of State could be used as a valid reason why the notice was not more specific and in defense of what some people would believe to be an arbitrary action. Indeed, I have great sympathy for the position taken by the Secretary of State when he said, "If we are to get anywhere in negotiating with these countries under the methods they have and are carrying out, free from objection, so far as I have been able to learn, we cannot throw this wide open to every person that wants to be heard."

I think that is a true statement if the proposed agreements are to be as effective as it is hoped and as it is intended they shall be. This testimony shows that the pending legislation is intended to imitate foreign governments; that is, it is intended to give the President the autocratic power now vested in many foreign executives. It is intended to supplant and take away the opinion of the Congress. The Secretary of State very modestly gives the impression that this extraordinary power is required because of the emergency.

This meaningless amendment with respect to notices has had the effect of eliminating some of the objections to this measure; but any person who carefully considers it must conclude that it was offered for that very purpose. The only excuse for not having such agreements approved by the Senate is because the purpose of the legislation cannot be effectuated by any such procedure. Approval by the Senate, as the testimony shows, would handicap the representative of this country in the negotiations, because the other country would know beforehand that the agreement could not be concluded without the approval of the Senate. In the second place, if that objection were not eliminated, there would be great delay in making the agreement effective.

The same thing is true to a large extent of any provision with respect to a notice to interested parties. I assume that in most agreements there would be many articles involved, and perhaps many representatives for each article who wanted to be heard. Such a hearing would destroy the purpose of the bill; and this amendment is accepted because it is harmless, because it satisfies certain people who have not carefully analyzed it, and because it will not in any sense seriously delay the final approval of any such agreement.

In addition to that, what particular good could come from an amendment which gave every possible opportunity for interested parties to be heard? What would be the purpose of any such hearing? It is quite unlike the present flexible provision in the tariff act. Under that provision it becomes the duty of the Tariff Commission, first, upon the request of the President, or, second, upon resolution of either or both Houses of Congress, or, third, upon its own motion, or, fourth when in the judgment of the Commission there is good and sufficient reason therefor upon application of any interested party to investigate the difference in the cost of production of any domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article. In the course of the investigation the Commission shall hold hearings and give reasonable public notice thereof, and shall afford reasonable opportunity for parties interested to be present, to produce evidence, and to be heard at such hearings—page 124, Tariff Act of 1930.

The Commission is by the act given specific instructions as to what is the issue before it to be determined. There is every reason in such case for a public hearing, because the Commission is endeavoring to ascertain a certain fact. In this bill no such issue is involved. The fact which the President under this bill is to ascertain is whether the existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States, or any foreign country, are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States, and that the purpose described in the bill will be promoted, and so forth. The mere hearing of the protest of any interested person cannot determine this fact. The only possible chance such a person would have is that described by Mr. O'Brien when he called attention to the fact that "every Senator, particularly of the party of the President of the United States, has access to the President. Tariffs are not a taboo subject. Every President has theories, has beliefs of what he wants to do regarding the tariff. At least, his senatorial and other friends have views of what they want to do"—page 150, hearings.

So if we take Mr. O'Brien's views we get the distinct impression that the only purpose that could possibly be served by this amendment is to give persons having influence with the President an opportunity to enforce their views upon him for the benefit of the friends they are endeavoring to protect.

We have heard much discussion and much criticism of logrolling methods in the making of tariffs in this country. Every person expresses the wish that we might find some way of avoiding any such procedure in tariff making. I think it must be admitted that this bill goes a long way toward eliminating that evil. I think it must be admitted at the same time that it has greatly simplified the job of the lobbyist. Instead of having to deal with individual Members of the Congress, he now has to deal with one person, the President of the United States. I do not wish to be misunderstood as suggesting that the President of the United States would be improperly influenced, but I do wish to be understood as saying that in the great job which the President has he must be guided largely in this matter, as in many others, by the large group of assistants he has gathered together to assist and advise him.

Those who are threatened with a change in the tariff will not go directly to the President of the United States; but does anybody doubt that ways and means will be found that will be very much more effective than a direct appeal? In my judgment the Senate Finance Committee amendment does not in any sense relieve this legislation of the viciousness inherent in it.

WHAT COMMODITIES WILL BE AFFECTED BY THE ACT?

Mr. President, I sought to ascertain from members of the President's Cabinet who appeared before the committee what commodities might be affected by the bill. I undertook to get from them an example of what they hoped to do. I asked two or three officials connected with the administration for an illustration of what it was believed might be done under the act. On page 13 of the hearings will be found the question I propounded to Secretary Hull and his answer thereto, as follows:

Senator HASTINGS. I would like to ask a question. I was wondering whether or not, Mr. Secretary, you could not give us one single illustration that you have in your mind which you believe might be worked out to advantage to the country under this particular power which is requested.

Senator CONNALLY. Aluminum would be a good one.

That gives an idea of how the mind of the Senator from Texas was running. I doubt whether he realized at the time he made that remark that oil might be one, too. I continue the quotation from the hearing:

Senator HASTINGS. Let us see what would be done with one item.

Senator CONNALLY. The Senator from Delaware is opposed to the duty on aluminum?

Senator HASTINGS. If the Senator would allow the Secretary to answer my question——

Senator CONNALLY. The Senator has the right to ask as many questions as he wishes, but since this appears to be a partisan political heckling——

Senator HASTINGS (interposing). Mr. Chairman, I have asked a reasonable question. If the Secretary thinks it is not reasonable and cannot answer it, I am perfectly willing to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sure the Secretary is fully competent to answer.

Secretary HULL. The first thing we realize is that it would be very presumptuous to take up in any detail plans and items which would be the basis of reciprocity negotiations. We might do so, as I indicated a little while ago, before the bill is passed, but when we came to the negotiations, the exchange situation, the currency disorder, the changing of quotas, and the raising of other obstructions, might present an entirely different picture. Therefore, out of our respect for the Congress and so as not to count our chickens until they are not only hatched but walking around, we have not undertaken to go into those detailed phases. Some gentleman before the Ways and Means Committee inquired how it would be possible to bring in more goods at greater value than at present, and I sought to indicate what an awful situation, what an awful problem we have, by calling attention to the fact that in 1929 when we thought we were going along very well we were importing over $3,000,000,000 worth of goods more than we are now.

I assume that at the time the Secretary made that statement he knew about the Colombian Treaty, with which I am not very familiar.

Incidentally it will be observed that before the Secretary could answer my question the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] gave his view by stating that "aluminum would be a good one." But the Secretary of State was more careful than the Senator from Texas and avoided giving any information. I sought this information in good faith, because I was trying to ascertain whether there was any economic wisdom in making these trade agreements. I think it must be admitted that it is impossible to make tariff concessions that will be beneficial to our export trade without imposing hardships upon somebody somewhere.

The able Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the leader on this side of the Chamber, made the same effort with the distinguished chairman of the committee on the floor of the Senate that I made in the committee with members of the President's Cabinet. The observation made by the Senator from Oregon and the answer made by the Senator from Mississippi appear in the RECORD.

It will be observed that no information has yet been given by proponents of this bill, except that, as I understand from the leader, there have been some assurances with respect to wool.

In my effort to speculate as best I may as to what might happen, I have selected for the purpose of illustration two countries, one of which, at least, has been mentioned in press reports as a country with which we might advantageously negotiate an agreement of this kind.

Suppose we take Mexico. In 1931, which is the last year for which a fully detailed table is available, our imports from Mexico were valued at $47,500,000, while our exports to that country were approximately $51,000,000. In common with the experience of all countries, these figures are less than they were a few years earlier. Because of the fact that Mexico is one of our closest neighbors and a country with which it might be thought quite natural for us to trade, I ask Senators to look with me at some of the problems which will be involved.

Perhaps the most important thing to do first is to examine the statistics of our import trade with that country for the purpose of finding what demands the Mexican Government might make of our representatives if we were to negotiate an agreement, then to consider the likelihood of our representatives acceding to such demands, and to consider briefly some of the possible consequences of such accession.

To do this we must look first at the record of our importations from Mexico, and, as I pointed out a moment ago, the last year for which we have detailed figures readily available is 1931, although the Tariff Commission has recently prepared a partial analysis for the year 1932, apparently as the basis for action under these proposed trade agreements.

Among the most important imports from Mexico in 1931 were cattle; fish; lobsters; shrimp; goat and kid skins; reptile skins; cleaned rice; green peas; chick peas; tomatoes and other fresh vegetables; bananas; coffee; vanilla beans; chicle; raw cotton and cotton waste; sisal and henequen; istle; binding twine; crude petroleum and topped oils, including fuel oil; copper concentrates and regulus; lead ore and bullion; antimony ore; white arsenic; and fertilizers and materials. Importations of each of these articles amounted to from $100,000 to as much as $7,000,000. Some of them, of course, are admitted into the United States free of duty, while others are subject to duty. In the case of the duty-free commodities, all that the United States could do would be to pledge the retention of these commodities on the free list.

Vastly more important in the eyes of the Mexican authorities, I believe, would be the possibility of obtaining from the United States Government concessions in duties on many of the items which are now dutiable. There is unmistakable evidence in the case of those commodities which were subjected to a tax in the Revenue Act of 1932 that that tax was highly effective in cutting down the importation of the commodities covered by the tax. Importations from Mexico of crude petroleum and fuel oil and copper since the revenue law of 1932 was enacted have been very greatly reduced, and the experience in respect to these commodities certainly would carry a very convincing argument in the minds of the Mexican officials that a reduction in those duties would go a long way toward reestablishing trade in those commodities.

It would seem to me, then, that it is a reasonable assumption that among the chief demands on the part of the Mexican authorities in dealing with our representatives for the conclusion of a reciprocal trade agreement would be that we reduce by the maximum possible allowance under the law the duties on cattle, cleaned rice, green peas, chick peas, tomatoes, and many other fresh vegetables, vanilla beans, crude petroleum, topped oils, and unrefined copper and lead. This list is incomplete, and made up in terms of the principal imports of 1931. There are other commodities on the dutiable list which we at one time imported in considerable quantity from Mexico which may well be included in their list of requests. For example, to give only one illustration, in 1929 we imported over $500,000 worth of oil cake and meal from Mexico, while in 1931 importations had dropped to less than $10,000. Such an item might well be included in the list proposed by the representatives of the Mexican Government for a reduction of duty as part of our concession in a reciprocal agreement. There are unquestionably many other such items. The question now arises as to whether or not there will be any disposition on the part of the representatives of our Government to make concessions on this requested list.

Perhaps the best we can do under the circumstances is to try to get the attitude of the principal member of the administration whose duty it will be to negotiate these treaties. Secretary Hull appeared before the committees of the House and Senate; he was the first witness to speak before both committees; it is assumed, therefore, that the administration is relying upon its Secretary of State to convince Congress that this bill ought to pass, and the Congress has a right to assume that the negotiations will be conducted under his direction.

In London, on July 21 of last year, in a resolution submitted by Secretary Hull in the Economic Commission of the World Economic Conference, there appears the following statement by him:

> In shaping its policy and executing its obligations under any agreement each government should direct its first and greatest efforts toward eliminating the restrictions and reducing the duties which most clearly lack economic justification.
> Particularly, (a) duties or restrictions which now completely or almost completely exclude foreign competition, such as those which restrict the importation of particular commodities to less than 5 percent of the domestic consumption thereof.
> (b) Duties or restrictions on articles whose imports have been substantially curtailed since 1929 as compared with domestic consumption.

Last December, speaking before the Seventh International Conference of the American States at Montevideo, the Secretary of State repeated the recommendation that commodities the importations of which were less than 3 to 5 percent of domestic consumption were particularly adapted for bargaining purposes.

But let us turn to another authority. The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], a former member of the Tariff Commission and a well-known authority on tariff matters, made a radio address on April 28, which was placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on April 30 last, at the request of the distinguished Democratic leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. This address was in support of the pending bill. I desire to quote from it as follows:

> TARIFF-BARGAINING POSSIBILITIES
> In such an era it is important to recognize that all tariff-bargaining gates are not closed. Following the last election, and before inauguration, I conferred with then President-elect Roosevelt with a view to securing, with the help of the United States Tariff Commission, for use in tariff bargaining, little-known facts showing profitable subjects and areas for advantageous trade agreements with leading foreign countries. Later I introduced in the United States Senate resolutions, which the Senate approved, calling for reports from the Tariff Commission. Those reports, long since printed, are in various respects distinctly creditable to the experts of that Federal agency and are now being used by governmental officials. If the proposed bargaining authority is given, the assembled material will helpfully assist President Roosevelt in negotiating advantageous agreements. I mention these facts to emphasize that there are larger possibilities of mutually beneficial commerce flowing from reciprocal trade agreements than critics of bargaining methods are prone to admit. Let me recall, solely for illustration, that the Tariff Commission's statistics on imports include lists of definite articles burdened by tariffs although those articles are not produced in this country; articles of which imports are less than 5 percent of domestic production, although even high-tariff advocates profess to favor competition as a restraint on monopolistic prices; articles on which tariff duties exceed—in some cases far exceed—50 percent ad valorem; articles which are more or less not competitive with domestic products; and articles with respect to which foreign countries possess decided advantages in production.
> It ought to be evident that among such articles will be found fertile opportunities for profitable trade bargaining to open closed markets to our products of farms and factories.

The resolution referred to in this address was Senate Resolution 325, and the Tariff Commission in response to that resolution has placed upon every Senator's desk an elaborate analysis. Bear in mind what these two authorities on the subject have in mind as a fertile field for negotiation. The Tariff Commission states in its introductory remarks that for convenience the report is divided into 4 parts: Part 1 relates to information on imports into the United States; part 2 relates to exports; part 3 presents data on the range and variety of costs; part 4 has to do with tariff bargaining.

It will be observed that the Secretary of State has in mind "reducing the duties which most clearly lack economic justification", and he illustrates it by including commodities of which the imports are less than 5 percent of the domestic consumption, and imports which have been substantially curtailed since 1929, as compared with domestic consumption.

The Senator from Colorado includes in his suggestion not only articles of which imports are less than 5 percent of domestic consumption, but also articles on which the rate exceeds 50 percent ad valorem. I am quite certain Secretary Wallace would call an industry that needed a 50-percent protection an inefficient industry and one which ought to be eliminated from our industrial list.

But let us take as an illustration cattle from Mexico. We find it listed among those commodities of which the imports have substantially decreased, and listed again among those commodities imports of which represent less than 5 percent of domestic production. In other words, if the test specified by our Secretary of State in his remarks at London are to be applied, unless some other circumstances are introduced, it is reasonable to suppose that our Government would be receptive to a suggestion from the Mexican Government that the duty on cattle be cut in half.

The second item on the list is cleaned rice. In the Tariff Commission report, cleaned rice appears among those commodities of which the imports have decreased, and of which the imports represent less than 5 percent of domestic production, and also upon the list of articles on which the tariff rate exceeds 50 percent ad valorem. Again, presumably, there would be a disposition to grant the request that the rate of duty on cleaned rice be cut by the maximum allowance.

The third item is green peas. These are reported by the Tariff Commission on the list which shows imports to have decreased, and on the list which indicates that the duty is in excess of 50 percent ad valorem, and on the list referred to in the radio address of the Senator from Colorado, and also in the testimony of Chairman O'Brien before the Ways and Means Committee which is entitled, "Dutiable articles more or less noncompetitive and with respect to which foreign countries possess an advantage." From all indications, because of the inclusion of this commodity in the last list, it would be among the first of the commodities to be subjected to a reduction in duty.

Dried chick peas are included in the list of articles the importations of which have decreased; tomatoes are included in the list of commodities the ad valorem duty on which is in excess of 50 percent; vanilla beans are listed as among those commodities, importations of which are more or less noncompetitive and with respect to which foreign countries possess advantages; crude petroleum and unrefined copper are listed as among those items for which imports have been reduced, while lead is listed as having a low ratio of imports to domestic production. The only item among all those which I have mentioned as to which we might expect a request for a decrease in duty, that is not included in one of these Tariff Commission lists, is topped oils.

I have no doubt a more exhaustive analysis of our trade with Mexico would disclose a number of other commodities which are included in the lists we have been discussing, and on which, presumably, our officials would be willing to reduce the duty if the request were made. A few of the commodities in the list of articles of which the imports represent less than 5 percent of domestic production are the following: Sheep, lamb, tuna fish packed in oil, cottonseed oil, pecans, beets and lettuce, green beans, and zinc. I shall not attempt to try and point out the very considerable number of States in which there are produced one or more of the commodities which we have seen might well be among those on which we would reduce the duty in the event of a reciprocal trade agreement with Mexico; but as I have been outlining this partial list of commodities that might be involved, it must be apparent that the producing interests in a great many of our Southern and Western States would be vitally concerned with the consequences of any such reciprocal agreement as would reduce duties on some of these commodities. I do not believe that the producers of these commodities can find in the proposed arrangements any very satisfactory assurance that their interests would be adequately safeguarded in the course of negotiation of any such treaty.

I have analyzed the situation with respect to but one country, and yet we find an extensive list of commodities for which there is every indication that their protection might be reduced, and a further indication of the extent to which such reductions might affect the people in a large number of States.

Now, let me take as another illustration a European country, and one that has also been mentioned in press reports as a country with which we might well afford to negotiate an agreement—Switzerland.

The chief imports from Switzerland in 1931 were cheese, leather footwear, cotton cloth and other manufactures of cotton, linen handkerchiefs, silk bolting cloths and other fabrics, rayon yarns, hat materials of straw, and so forth; aluminum metal; coal-tar colors, dyes, and stains; watches, movements, and parts, and jewels for movements. All these commodities are dutiable.

Let us see how they are classified in what may well be properly termed the "bargaining list" which I was using in the analysis of imports from Mexico. Cheese is listed among the commodities the imports of which have substantially decreased; leather shoes are also included in this list, as well as among those the importations of which represent less than 5 percent of domestic production; cotton cloth appears on both of the foregoing lists, and, in addition, some types of cloth are included in the list of articles on which the tariff rate exceeds 50 percent ad valorem; linen handkerchiefs and silk bolting cloth are listed among the commodities of which the imports are substantially decreased; rayon yarns are reported under each of the three lists already mentioned; hat materials are listed among the commodities imports of which have declined and again among the group of duitable articles more or less noncompetitive and with respect to which foreign countries possess advantages. Aluminum metal is listed among the articles of which imports have substantially decreased, as are coal-tar colors, dyes, and stains, this latter group also being classified among the articles on which the tariff rate exceeds 50 percent ad valorem. Watches, movements, and parts are also classified in the same two lists as chemical coal-tar colors, dyes, and stains, while jewels for watches are reported among the commodities imports of which have substantially decreased and again on the list which are more or less noncompetitive and with respect to which foreign countries possess advantages. We see, then, that all the principal dutiable imports from Switzerland are recorded on one or more of the bargaining lists in the Tariff Commission's report in response to Senate Resolution No. 325.

May I remind the Senate that this is only a partial list based on the principal importations in the year 1931, and that there are unquestionably many more commodities included in the bargaining list which the Swiss Government might wish to include in the list of concessions that they wish to obtain. To mention but a few which I found in the list of articles of which imports represent less than 5 percent of domestic production, there are strychnine and salts, chrome metal and ferrochrome, cases for clocks and clockwork mechanisms, steam turbines, aluminum shapes, dried cream, wool knit underwear, silk yarn, silk knit underwear and handkerchiefs, woven fabrics of rayon, ribbons and small ware, all of which might well be included in this bargaining list.

Without a more specific method of safeguarding the interests of the domestic producers of these various products, it is not unreasonable to suppose that any or all of them might be included among the concessions granted by the United States Government in the process of arriving at a reciprocal trade agreement. Again, I shall not attempt to point out to my colleagues the list of States that are most seriously concerned in the production of the commodities covered, but it is, I think, quite evident that they are numerous, and that they, on the whole, supplement rather than duplicate the list of States in which producers might suffer in the event of an agreement with Mexico.

I have, Mr. President, tried to present a fair picture of what might well be expected in the case of negotiations with two countries. I have undertaken this, as I pointed out, because of the very general character of the statements that have been made by the proponents of this bill in the course of their representations and arguments. I was concerned to know just what might be involved in any such negotiations, and I have proceeded in what I believe is as fair a manner as possible within the limited time and facilities at my personal disposal to make such an analysis for the two countries that I have discussed. Neither of these countries is among the most important in terms of trade, and I feel warranted in the assumption that a similar analysis in the case of, let us say, Canada or the United Kingdom, would show that the number of products of American agriculture, mine and timber producers, and industry, whose position would be jeopardized by such possible agreements, would be infinitely greater than those affected in the case of Mexico and Switzerland.

Mr. President, it may be said that this tedious outline, with respect to the commodities coming from these two countries, is merely an imaginary picture, and in addition to that, one that is greatly exaggerated, but I assert as an excuse and reason for thus imposing upon the Senate, the impossibility of getting from those who are in favor of this bill the slightest information as to what articles are to be affected by the agreements which the President is authorized under this bill to make.

What answer can I make or what answer can any other Senator make to his constituents who are alarmed and distressed because the tariff protection which now barely permits them to live may be taken away? It merely demonstrates and emphasizes the great danger that lies at the foundation of this proposed legislation.

Ordinarily a bill before the Senate has in it provisions which the average person can understand and from which he may determine whether it affects him or whether it does not. Under normal conditions, with the Senate operating in a deliberate fashion, he will have an opportunity to protest to his representative in the Senate. He will have an opportunity to place before his representative arguments against the adoption of the bill, or to make proposals of amendments that will do him the least harm. It is true that he may not be able to convince the Senator from his own State that the proposed legislation is bad, but he does have the one opportunity which he as an American is accustomed to have, namely, an opportunity to be heard by his representatives in the Congress. In this instance, however, a Senator is compelled to admit to his constituents that he does not know what this proposed legislation means. If he has given but casual consideration to it, he will explain that it means to give to the President the power to reduce tariff rates 50 percent; but if that Senator has given the same careful consideration to the measure that I have, he will be compelled to admit that, under the very terms of this bill, the tariff which now protects may be utterly destroyed. He will be compelled to admit more than that; he will be compelled to admit that this authority over the tariff rates has been placed in the hands of a single individual, and that single individual may, by contract with foreign countries, place beyond the control of the Congress itself the authority to change that tariff for a period of 6 years; and if he be fair at all with his constituent, he will point out to him that this gives to the President an opportunity to favor whatever farm products he cares to favor; to favor whatever industries he cares to favor; and to punish the producers of whatever farm products he cares to punish; and to destroy whatever industry he cares to destroy.

This is not an exaggerated statement. I am talking about what we, as legislators, must admit. I am talking about the power which, under the Constitution, belongs to the Congress and which the Members of Congress have agreed to pass on to the President. It will not be denied that the Congress has the power to destroy the tariff entirely, and the only possible dispute that could arise about what I have said is whether or not my construction is correct that the powers thus given to the President are as unlimited as I believe them to be.

It might be well, however, to point out to the person complaining about this proposed legislation that the President is honest, that he is wise, that he has the best interest of the people of the Nation at heart; and the distressed farmer or the distressed industrialist ought, therefore, to go home and rest in peace and trust to the wisdom and honesty of a great Executive.

That answer, however, cannot be satisfactory to every person interested, nor, in my judgment, can it be satisfactory even to a small percentage of the persons interested, because, as I have pointed out, the Secretary of State believes that the particular commodities which are now protected by a sufficient duty to restrict the importations to less than 5 percent of the domestic consumption are proper subjects for such an agreement. This means that the Secretary of State desires to make a contract with other Nations so that they may increase their exports to this country to an amount that exceeds 5 percent of our domestic consumption. This does not mean that the quantity consumed is to be increased. It means, although there is an American manufacturer, employing high-priced American labor, producing 95 percent of all of a certain article that is used in this country, that the tariff upon that particular article is to be so reduced that the foreign competitor who is now selling 5 percent may have an opportunity to increase it to 10 percent, 25 percent, or 50 percent, or it may be to drive the American manufacturer entirely out of existence. It is the tariff protection that limits the foreign importations to 5 percent; and the minute you reduce the tariff, you increase the foreign importations, you reduce the amount manufactured in our own country with American labor, and yet the proponents of this bill suggest that its purpose is to overcome domestic unemployment.

Of course, the answer to this is that in this bargaining process by which we will permit the imports of this particular commodity to be increased from 5 percent to an unknown quantity, we expect to get a return in favor of some other industry in America by increasing the exports of that particular commodity. But that is no satisfactory answer to the industry that is now supplying 95 percent of that commodity to the American consuming public. However, that is not all; the chances are that, while you may increase that 5 percent to 25 percent or 50 percent, the increase in the export of some other article will be but a small percentage of that particular exporter's product.

The second suggestion of the Secretary of State was that the power should be exercised so as to deal with those commodities the imports of which have been substantially curtailed since 1929 as compared with domestic consumption. The same argument applies to this suggestion, and it is quite clearly the argument of a man who believes in free trade. This suggestion is virtually a complaint about the curtailing of imports. It agrees with the condemnation of the Democratic Party of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill and cannot be effective in overcoming the domestic unemployment.

But the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] would include in the bargaining list articles bearing a duty of 50 percent ad valorem and more. An industry requiring this sort of protection, I have no doubt, comes within the definition of an inefficient industry, which Secretary Wallace believes must be eliminated.

I think I have pointed out what must be considered the best evidence we have and what is contemplated by the proponents of this legislation, and I think if we could eliminate from consideration for a moment the great objection to placing this power in the hands of the President, we would then reach the conclusion that the difference between Secretary Hull and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], on the one side, and those who believe in a protective tariff, on the other side, is the difference on this particular issue between the advocacy of a protective tariff and the advocacy of free trade.

But, Mr. President, one may get another glimpse of what the proponents of this measure have in mind by turning to page 114 of the hearings, from which I shall read a portion of the testimony of Mr. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State. This particular portion of his testimony had to do with most-favored-nation agreements:

Mr. SAYRE. The purpose of the act is this, sir, to enable the President to extend these privileges or reduced duties not only to the country with which we negotiate the particular, specific trade agreement but to all other countries which perhaps have most-favored-nation treaties with us, to whom, of course, we would have to extend them. They would, indeed, be generally applicable unless the President should suspend their application as set forth in the language which I have just read.

Senator GORE. That does not quite go to my point.

Mr. SAYRE. Perhaps I did not understand the question, sir.

Senator GORE. Suppose the first agreement which you make under this act with some foreign country automatically extends its benefits to all other countries under the most-favored-nation clause. Then they have no motive to trade with us—they have what they want. How are you going to trade with them where they might keep out some of our goods that we want to get in?

Mr. SAYRE. I think I understand your point. The whole purpose of the program of trade bargaining is this, to restrict the commodities covered in the agreement with any specific country to commodities of which that country furnishes the chief source of supply of importation into the United States. Then, under our most-favored-nation agreement, to generalize those rates to other countries.

Senator GORE. It would be a dead letter so far as they were concerned. They would not have anything to come in under that, although they would have the privilege of coming in.

Mr. SAYRE. We have made careful study of some 29 different countries, sir, and find that each of them furnishes the chief source of supply of one or more commodities to the United States.

Senator GORE. Would it be contrary to your policy to list those countries?

Mr. SAYRE. I have already set forth a tabular statement in my testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, which I should like to have inserted here.

In that tabulated statement the countries are not named, but they are numbered. It would not be wise, I think, to name the countries, because it would give away some of our bargaining power by doing so.

More than that, Mr. President, it would do like this: It would give to some of us some idea about what they had in their minds. So they are perfectly secret about it all, and they give us the list of 29 countries and give us the number of articles which they are considering and the amount of the imports.

Senator GORE. So that you figure, as an actual matter of fact and practice, you would get from each country under this contract the products which it could raise which we require, and while you nominally permitted the other countries to ship the same sort of stuff into our market, they would not have anything to ship?

Mr. SAYRE. Speaking in round, general terms, they certainly would not have large supplies to ship, and our purpose in doing that is to generalize rates and to pull down the tariff barriers in a general way and apply them equally to those countries.

Mr. President, the list referred to appears on page 115 of the hearings. There are four columns, the first column showing the number of articles, the second the amount of imports based upon the 1931 report, the third column total imports from the particular country, and in the last column an effort is made to show the percentage of articles which are in mind compared to the total of the imports from that country. But some very careful student began an investigation to find out what was in the mind of the Secretary of State or the persons who had to do with compiling the list.

As indicated on pages 366 and 367 of the hearings, it will be found that the first country is Belgium. There is an analysis of what comes from Belgium. There is an analysis of what the Secretary of State said comprises the important items from that country with which we might deal. Then, we find a similar analysis with respect to Brazil, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, and other countries. The principal one is France with 84 articles. If we look at pages 371 to 373, we find those articles listed. This is perhaps the best evidence of what it is contemplated will be the articles which will come into this country. I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD, at the conclusion of my remarks, pages 371 to 373 of the committee hearings, which contain the list of articles from France.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to mention incidentally some of the articles. Included in the number are shelled walnuts; cotton floor covering; other wool-knit goods; silk laces and lace articles; silk wearing apparel; vanilla beans; canned mushrooms; other silk wearing apparel; perfumery; bay rum; toilet water; silk pile fabrics; silk pile fabrics manufactures; wood furniture; silk broad fabrics; paper boxes; perfume materials, and so forth. By going through the whole list there is no doubt that each Senator would find some industry in his own State which is now protected by the tariff.

Mr. President, the list has a further advantage to which I wish to call attention. As an illustration, one of the commodities with which it is proposed to deal, I take the third article, shelled walnuts. The percentage from France coming to this country is 31, 64 percent coming from countries having the unconditional favored-nation clause.

If we make an agreement with France with respect to the tariff on shelled walnuts, as I have pointed out, and I think, made perfectly clear, the tariff can be wholly destroyed if the President cares to do it, because he is not limited to 50 percent. He can shift an article from one classification to another. He can shift the form from ad valorem to specific. He can reduce the rate by the Tariff Commission's recommendation 50 percent, in the first place, and when he gets through he can take it off entirely. When he does that with France on the one item, he does it 64 percent with China because of the favored-nation clause.

In the hearings to which I have been referring is a most interesting list showing how impossible it is for us to get the full value of what we may do with respect to the reducing of the tariff with one country because of that clause in the various treaties. It is true that in many instances France furnishes the larger portion of the imports, in the case of silk laces, and so forth, as much as 91 percent. That item would not be very greatly affected. I have picked out an article as to which 64 percent would come in without getting any compensatory contract of any kind.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is speaking about the French portion of the imports. May I remind him of the Tariff Commission's report a year ago which warns us of the so-called "padding" process by which European countries have become experts in putting their rates up in order to have something to back down on, so they lose nothing in the net transaction. With that in mind I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that on May 18 of this year it is proposed in Paris to increase the import duty on American films 3,300 percent. I do not know whether or not that is one of the padding processes for bargain purposes, but it beautifully illustrates the cycle of duress to which we can easily be subjected in this perfectly futile effort remotely to break even in one of these amazing transactions.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the Senator. That reminds me of a letter I have on my desk from a glazed kid manufacturer in my State calling attention to the fact that just recently—I cannot remember the country, but I believe it is Germany—the quota had been reduced from 100 percent to 35 percent beginning May 1, 1934. The letter asked me whether there was something that could be done about it. I have no doubt that the limitation placed upon the article is for the sole purpose of enabling the German Government the better to make an agreement with this country. That coincides with and bears out the statement made by the Senator from Michigan upon that point.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think the suggestion the Senator just made by the illustration of shelled walnuts is interesting. He referred to the fact that France is shipping to us 32 percent of our imports of shelled walnuts and other countries the remainder, although France would be shipping much more than any other one country. If we make reciprocal trade agreements in favor of France and the favored-nation clause is invoked by the other countries, how are we going to avoid doing with those countries what we have done with France?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think that is admitted. I think the proponents of the bill admit that that automatically works. We do not have to do anything about it.

Mr. FESS. Then, carried to its final conclusion, what is going to be the effect?

Mr. HASTINGS. The effect is going to be that, if in bargaining with a country which is sending to the United States 31 percent of our total imports of a given commodity we shall reduce the rate on that one item in order to induce that country to take some additional exports from us, we will admit 64 percent of the particular importation without getting any corresponding improvement of our exports from the other countries affected.

Mr. FESS. Precisely; and if it is carried to that final conclusion it would simply mean that the increased imports by favored-nation agreements would ultimately entirely destroy our domestic production.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. FESS. If for any reason we do not have something compensatory to give to the other countries, then the other countries could openly charge that we are dealing with one country in a different manner than we are dealing with them, and it would be a source of international bad feeling.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct.

Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to hear all the debate on this bill or to read all the record of the debate, though I have read most of it. I do not know whether or not the particular subject which I now desire to discuss has been discussed during the debate. I shall not take very long with it, and I think it is important.

It is being continuously stated that American tariffs have recently been throttling the trade of foreign countries and have been preventing the importation of many important commodities with which foreign countries might pay their bills to the United States, either for our exports or for their debt service. It seems worth while, therefore, to list our chief imports in the order of their importance in 1933, and to show the percentage change in the quantity of these items imported over the past 10 years.

Percent change in quantity of chief export items for the year 1933 compared with the 1921–25 average, and relative importance of the same commodities in total value of imports in 1933 [1]

	Quantity—percent of change in 1933 over 1921–25	Value—percent of total imports in 1933
Coffee	+18	8.6
Cane sugar	−29	7.4
Raw silk	+29	7.1
Newsprint	+51	4.7
Oilseeds and expressed vegetable oils	+24	4.3
Wood pulp	+49	4.0
Tin	+7	3.5
Crude rubber	+38	3.2
Hides and skins	−21	3.2
Total		46.0

[1] All figures presented herewith are derived from the latest Government reports.

The above items are, and for a long time have been, our most important import commodities, and all are duty free except a portion of the cane sugar and a portion of the hides and skins. From the figures it appears that, with the exception of cane sugar and hides and skins, the quantity of each item imported was much higher in 1933 than in the average year 1921–25, which the United States Department of Commerce has customarily used as a base period for measuring changes. The drop in importation of cane sugar is due primarily to the heavy tariff imposed on Cuban sugar for the benefit of domestic beet-sugar growers and cane-sugar producers in Hawaii and Puerto Rico, which, as Territories of the United States, do not pay duties and whose figures are not included in our general imports. In our own possessions we now produce many times as much sugar as is imported from Cuba or other foreign countries.

As compared with the base period, all United States exports in 1933 showed a drop of 62 percent in value but only 29 percent in quantity, and after the early part of 1933 both the quantity and the value of exports began to increase. The first quarter of 1934 has shown for all exports a value increase of 59 percent over the corresponding period in 1933 and an estimated quantity increase ranging from 15 to 30 percent.

It is striking that the sharpest decline in exports, both in value and in quantity, has been experienced in corn and in wheat and wheat flour, the aggregate drop for these three items being 94 percent in value since 1921–25, with almost as sharp a drop in quantity.

When major economic groups of exports are examined, it appears that the general trend of crude foodstuffs and manufactured foodstuffs has been definitely and upon the whole rather sharply downward in quantity as well as in value since the end of the war period. When crude and manufactured foodstuffs are excluded from the total, the estimated drop in actual quantity of goods exported in 1933 was only 13 percent under the base period 1921–25, as compared with a drop of 16 percent in the quantity of industrial production in the United States. For the year 1933 there was a slight gain in quantity over 1932.

Out of 44 important export items for which quantities are available, it appears that 18 showed an increase in 1933 over the base period 1921–25, while 35 out of 44 showed increases in 1933 as compared with 1932 ranging from 1 percent to 153 percent. With the exception of anthracite and refined oils, virtually every item failing to show an increase in 1933 was an agricultural product; and the sharpest declines were in those items, such as cotton, wheat, and wheat flour, for which the Government has tried to do most and in which prices have been forced to a point far above the world level.

It is further striking that out of 19 important manufactured export items, mostly machinery, equipment, and chemicals, only 6 in 1933 showed a quantity drop under the average for the base period 1921–25. In view of the curtailment of our potential exports of manufactured goods by the establishment of many branch factories abroad during the past decade and by our purchases of foreign factories, this showing seems rather remarkable. For the year 1933 nearly every important manufactured product showed a substantial increase over the preceding year, with the exception of cotton cloth of various kinds.

It is striking to find that out of 35 important commodities or commodity groups, 24 actually showed a greater proportion of the annual production exported in 1933 than in 1923. Further, of the 11 items important in 1923 which showed a decrease in relative quantity exported 10 years later, several of the more important showed only a negligible change, particularly copper, cotton cloth, and automobile tires. It is again noticeable that the really serious declines in relative importance of exports occurred in wheat, meat products, and corn, due primarily to the fact that other parts of the world have been growing more nearly self-supporting, as well as because of our attempts more recently to maintain artificially high prices.

One of the striking facts is that the production of our crude foodstuffs as well as of our manufactured foodstuffs was greatly and artificially stimulated by the World War. Since the period following the war there has been an almost uninterrupted tendency toward rather sharp declines in the quantity of these items exported, until in 1933 the quantity of crude foodstuffs had actually declined 60 percent below the 1913 period and 86 percent below the 1921 level. Also, the quantity of manufactured foodstuffs exported had dropped one-third below the level of 20 years ago.

On the other hand, the quantity of crude materials exported in 1933 was actually 5 percent higher than in 1921 and only 8 percent lower than in 1913. Similarly, the quantity of semimanufactures in 1933 stood at the same level as in 1921; while the entire quantity of finished manufactures exported during the past year was about as high as in 1913 and only 18 percent below the 1921 level.

In this connection it is highly important to note that, contrary to popular misapprehension, our farm products as represented by crude foodstuffs and manufactured foodstuffs together, even in 1913 amounted to less than 21 percent of the value of all our exports; in the period 1921–25, when our export trade was very prosperous, they amounted to less than one-fourth of all our exports; and in 1933 these two economic groups amounted to less than one-eighth of the value of all exports.

On the other hand, finished manufactures and semimanufactures in 1913 constituted about 49 percent of the value of all our exports, and crude materials slightly over 30 percent. In the period 1921–25 finished manufacturers and semimanufactures also accounted for 49 percent of our exports, and crude materials amounted to almost 28 percent. In 1933 finished manufactures and semimanufactures amounted to 52 percent, while crude materials had risen to about 36 percent of the total.

The trends shown by these facts are unmistakable and should be seriously considered by those who believe that through any artificial price manipulation or tariff bargaining it may be possible within the near future to expand greatly the market for our agricultural produce. After examining the record, it would seem that no greater mistake can be made than to assume that a mere reduction in our import tariffs on manufactured goods will make it possible for foreign nations to take more of our agricultural products. Our agricultural production was greatly overstimulated by the war and the unsettled period following, but many of our important foreign customers have now learned to make themselves more nearly self-sustaining in the production of foodstuffs.

In normal times by far the greatest market and the surest market for the product of our farmers has been in the industrial centers of our own country. Even though during the past decade we tried to stimulate our export market for farm commodities by means of heavy loans, we have found it impossible successfully to "buck" the world tide which has been running against us. On the other hand, there is grave danger that serious reductions in tariffs for bargaining purposes might flood our market with foreign manufactures, thus throwing more people out of employment at home and thereby curtailing the domestic market for the product of our own farms, without gaining any reciprocal increase whatever in the foreign markets for our farm produce.

Mr. President, I ask that at this point in my remarks I may insert in the RECORD without reading it a table showing the increases in proportion to the decreases of exports between 1923 and 1933. This table gives a list of the articles, with the percentages, in 1923 as compared with 1933. Out of the 35 items there are 24 that show an increase, and only 11 that show a decrease.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Export of leading commodities in relation to production

	Percent exported—
	1923	1933
ITEMS SHOWING INCREASE IN PROPORTION EXPORTED BETWEEN 1923 AND 1933
Crude materials:	Percent	Percent

[1] 1931. [2] 1932. [3] 1925.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, in this connection I desire to call attention to a statement made by the United States Tariff Commission, to the effect that the number of factory workers engaged in producing articles for export fell from 648,000 in 1929, the peak year, to 364,000 in 1931, a decrease, in round numbers, of 300,000 persons.

We have heard a great deal about getting our exports back to the high point of 1929, and we are urged constantly that if we can make these bargaining tariffs it will improve our export trade, and the improvement of our export trade will relieve us of unemployment, when the Tariff Commission itself shows that between 1929 and 1931, with a great decrease, a change in employment was effected of only 300,000 persons. They conclude:

> The aggregate decrease in employment resulting from the reduction in all exports (both agricultural and manufacturing) between 1929 and 1931 was, therefore, in the neighborhood of 500,000.

Matthew Woll delivered an address on March 6, 1934, showing that the American Federation of Labor was opposed to the pending bill, in which he stated:

> In other words, the Tariff Commission's investigation indicated in effect that if our exports were increased to the amount having prevailed before 1929 but 500,000 would be reemployed in both industry and agriculture. This represents less than 4 percent of our industrial workers who have been unemployed. Wage earners of America may, therefore, be rightly alarmed at the urgency of the proposal made to increase our exports when it is self-apparent that increased exports must necessarily be accompanied by an increase of imports, and therefore a consequent and perhaps greater loss of domestic employment due to an enhanced foreign competition in our home market.

Mr. President, the Secretary of State insists, and he bases his whole reasoning in connection with the request for this power, on the fact that there is a great emergency. The distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] yesterday called my attention to the fact that in May 1932 there was also an emergency, and he called attention to the inconsistent position of Secretary Hull at that time compared with his present position; but, no doubt because he did not care to interrupt me further, he did not read into the record what was said at that time.

I desire to read from the RECORD of May 1932, at page 10637, from an address by Mr. Hull, who was then a Member of the Senate. He was speaking of the veto message of the tariff bill passed in 1932. He said:

The President goes further and refers to the retention of the flexible tariff clause. At the time this clause was enacted I called attention in a speech in the House to the significance of this flexible-tariff policy and the effect of the proposed enactment of the present law in the following language:

"I am unalterably opposed to section 315 of the tariff act and demand its speedy repeal. I strongly condemn the proposed course of the Republican Party, which contemplates the enlargement and retention of this provision with such additional authority to the President as would practically vest in him the supreme taxing power of the Nation, contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution—a vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic king."

Mr. President, unless and until the executive department can make permanent the policy of the present Tariff Commission law, with its flexible provision, Congress can lay claim to some semblance of its taxing power under the Constitution, but I deny the right of the executive department practically to assume to arrogate to itself the chief power of tariff taxation in this country, while it ignores the great law-making body charged with that function and duty under the language of the Constitution.

The President dismisses this entire industrial and domestic trade situation, as it relates to tariffs, by the flippant remark that the Tariff Commission, through the operation of the flexible provision, will be amply able to raise or lower the tariff in response to all the sound needs and demands of industry and commerce in this country, both domestic and international.

There is an issue sharply presented as to whether this hand-picked high-tariff commission, under the domination of the President, who, at the same time, shows an amazing subserviency to the chief tariff beneficiaries of this country, shall be vested with the chief control of tariff making. I am opposed to it, and I believe that the sober second thought of the American people will repudiate this unprecedented and unusual and wholly unjustifiable arrogation of power and authority to the President.

He proceeds a little further by the Smoot-Hawley Act; and I want to say that if I had my way, I would offer a bill to abolish the present rather partisan Tariff Commission and seek the installment of a broad, impartial, fact-finding organization. I would repeal the flexible provision and restore to the Congress its rightful authority in tariff making.

Mr. President, I desire to discuss for a moment the matter under consideration when that speech was delivered by the present Secretary of State. I call attention to the fact that it was almost exactly 2 years ago when he spoke.

It may be that some of us have overlooked the fact that we passed a tariff bill in 1932. This was very clearly a Democratic measure, and expressed at that time, so far as I now recall, the leading thought of the Democratic Party.

I hold in my hand a copy of the veto message of President Hoover of that tariff bill, and contained in this pamphlet is a copy of the bill itself. I call attention to the following important features of that measure.

First. The recommendation of the Tariff Commission was to be approved by the Congress of the United States, and not by the President.

Second. No report of the Commission should be made until a public hearing was had and all persons interested permitted to be present and produce evidence.

Third. All investigations instituted prior to the approval of the act should be dismissed without prejudice; in other words, to undo all the Tariff Commission might then have under their control.

In addition to that the measure provided for a consumers' counsel, whose duty it should be to protect the public, and, incidentally, Senators might be interested in reading the act with respect to this item in particular:

(c) Within the limitations of such appropriations as the Congress may from time to time provide the counsel is authorized—

That is the consumers' counsel. Then in parenthesis—Senators have not heard this language for a long time, and will forget that it was ever written into a measure passed by Congress unless I remind them of it once in a while—is the following language:

(subject to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended) to appoint and fix the salaries of assistants and clerks, and is authorized to make such expenditure as may be necessary for the performance of the duties vested in him.

Here was a bill passed under the leadership of the Democrats, by the Democratic majority, providing for a consumers' counsel. The great cry of the Democratic Party up to that time had been that the tariff was an outrage upon the consumer. So it was the consumer they were undertaking to protect in the bill by providing that a consumers' counsel should be appointed, and then he should have help, and that help should be selected by him under civil service in order that it might not in any sense be partisan.

That, however, is not all this bill provided. The President was requested to initiate a movement for an international economic conference. That was not of very great importance. That was just a request.

In order to maintain competition among domestic producers and distributors, the consumers' counsel should be entitled to file complaint in the United States Customs Court, and the President was compelled to carry into effect the decisions of such court by proclamation.

Here was a very clear and a very definite effort to do something with the tariff that would eliminate the logrolling process about which so many people complain, and at the same time carry out the expression of the Democratic Party so violently and so strongly stated in September 1929, with respect to the Smoot-Hawley tariff law and the flexible provision under it. Here was an effort to do what they could to improve the tariff conditions, but they saw to it at all times that the Congress got a greater hold upon the tariff than it had had with the flexible provision as it was. There were all kinds of details set up as to what should happen when a recommendation was returned to the Congress. It was not possible to add anything to it except the items that had been considered by the Tariff Commission.

The bill gave to Congress the right to pass upon the tariff, but there were certain things with respect to competition which even the Tariff Commission could not work out satisfactorily, and it was, therefore, decided that the Customs Court should pass upon those questions.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask the Senator if he will consider in this connection the fact that the proposal for an economic conference and the entering into of agreements was conditioned upon having Congress act upon any agreement that might be effected.

Mr. HASTINGS. In answer to that question I desire to read section 4 of that bill, so that I may be certain that my answer is correct:

That the President is respectfully requested to initiate a movement for an International Economic Conference with a view to (a) lowering excessive tariff duties and eliminating discriminatory and unfair trade practices, and other economic barriers affecting international trade; (b) preventing retaliatory tariff measures and economic wars; and (c) promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations between nations—but with the understanding that any agreement, treaty, or arrangement which changes any tariff then in existence or in any way affects the revenue of the United States must first be approved by the Congress of the United States.

And this, I think, answers the Senator's question—

I desire to thank the Senator from Vermont for calling my attention to that about which I knew but had overlooked for a moment. I desire to say in further answer to his suggestion that the proponents of that Democratic measure were not satisfied with only that which the Constitution requires to be done—namely, to have the Senate ratify a treaty which has been negotiated—but they wanted to be certain that the other House of the Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole authority to initiate this kind of legislation, should also have an opportunity to pass on such treaty. Now the Secretary of State urges us to adopt the pending measure, saying that it is not practical to do those things which the Democratic Party favored, and points out to us how long it would take, and that we would not go far if it were necessary to go to the Congress to secure approval of tariff agreements. At the same time in an emergency, and in a great emergency, the relief proposed was to do that which I have just described. They were not satisfied to provide one condition—namely, approval by the Senate of the United States—but they compelled such agreements as were made by the President to be approved by both Houses of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, that bill was passed in May of 1932. It was vetoed by the President of the United States. I ask that the whole veto message, which includes the bill, may be inserted in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit B.)

Mr. HASTINGS. On July 2 of the same year, a little less than 2 months after the passage of that measure, which was proposed by the Democrats, Governor Roosevelt delivered his acceptanee speech. In that speech he said with respect to the tariff:

> Go into the home of the business man. He knows what the tariff has done for him. Go into the home of the factory worker. He knows why goods do not move. Go into the home of the farmer. He knows how the tariff has helped to ruin him.
> Yes; at last our eyes are open, at last the American people are ready to acknowledge that Republican leadership was wrong and that Democracy is right.

Now, let us look for a moment at the Democratic Campaign Book under "The Tariff", and see whether the pending proposal in any sense carries out the pledge, the promise as it appears in that book. Bear in mind that what they are now doing is being done after an experience of 13 months. If one reads what was said by the Democrats in the campaign of 1932, he gets the distinct impression that the first thing that would be done would be to pass a tariff bill which would be effective and which would destroy this depression. The heading in the campaign book is: "The Tariff—the Smoot-Hawley Bill and Executive Meddling."

> THE DEMOCRATIC POLICY
> The consensus of opinion among economists and other disinterested students of tariff taxation, as evidenced by their published utterances, is that the existing high tariff act enacted by the Republican Congress in 1930 and the reaction thereto in the form of retaliatory tariffs and other trade barriers by the principal foreign nations of the world constitute the largest single underlying factor in precipitating the existing economic depression. Governor Roosevelt has declared that the main issue of this campaign is our present economic condition.
> The chief economic issue between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party is the tariff, and this issue most clearly exemplifies the Republican doctrine of special privilege as opposed to the Democratic doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none."
> The Republican Party favors a tariff upon imports sufficiently high not only to enable the domestic producer to undersell in the American market the like imported foreign product after adding the amount of the tariff, but also to add a huge profit to the production cost of the domestic article. This is called "protection of home industry."
> The beneficiaries of the high protective-tariff policy of the Republican Party are a group of manufacturers who have enriched themselves by pocketing the amount of the "protection"—or tariff bonus—when the rates are fully effective, in addition to their legitimate profits in manufacturing their products. They are the ones who supply in largest measure the campaign funds to the Republican Party in exchange for these tariff benefits.

Mr. President, I do not believe those who wrote that statement believed it to be true; but assuming that they believed it, and assuming it to be true, then I say when you shall have passed this bill you will have certainly taken away any further opportunity we will have along that line. I say, more than that, that when you shall have passed it the Democratic Party, now in control, will have a very much greater opportunity to deal and dicker with the tariff along that line than any Republican administration ever had. Heretofore, after the passage of the tariff act, all the Republicans could do was to show to the Tariff Commission that there was good ground for increasing a tariff rate because of the difference in the cost of production at home and the cost abroad, but today or tomorrow or some other day when you shall have passed this measure there will be passed on to the Democratic President an opportunity which will make the opportunity it is alleged the Republican Party had look like one of very meager and insignificant proportions, because you will not only have left him the power which was reposed in the Republican President, but the same party which condemned that power will have added vastly to it. I propose to put in the RECORD speeches made by Senators on the other side of the aisle condemning the flexible provision of the tariff act.

One would suppose it would not be possible within a period of 5 years thereafter that any one of the Senators who made those speeches would stand upon the floor of the Senate and vote for any tariff measure which contained that reprehensible clause. That clause, however, is nothing now; it is of little or no importance; it still remains intact so that the President may do what the chairman of the committee says he may do, make his own tariff with respect to all commodities by decreasing the rates of duty 50 percent. But that it not all he may do. He may, in addition to that, make an agreement with another country decreasing the rates 50 percent; and before he does that he may change the form of valuation from American to foreign, from a specific duty to an ad valorem duty, or from an ad valorem duty to a specific duty; and if he is not satisfied with that, if that does not meet his purpose, if he has somebody close enough to him who wants to get some campaign funds, as we are charged in this handbook with doing—and if it be true that that sort of manipulation has been going on in the Republican Party—it is not too much to charge that it will be resorted to by the Democratic Party, because, after all, whatever may be said about them, they have not any better morals than have the Republicans, regardless of what one may say about their tariff views, then the President may change the classification and put an article in a different schedule. That power is conferred by the bill, and you are going to pass the bill in that form, I suppose, and there is no way for us to prevent it. It is an additional power given to the Democratic President.

But that is not all, for, if the President wants to do so, he can wipe out all the rates of duty that my friends on the other side in 1932 struggled to place in the tariff act. He can wipe out the duty on imported lumber, upon which was placed a $3 tax in order to protect the lumber industry of this Nation. What is the poor man engaged in the lumber industry going to do when somebody representing the President says: "Look at what we said about the Republicans in our book in 1932; we called attention to the fact that the protected industries supply in largest measure of campaign funds to the Republican Party in exchange for tariff benefits; that I represent Mr. Farley, and I say to you who are interested in lumber if you do not 'come across' in the 1934 campaign, I will go and tell him; he knows the way to reach the higher-ups, and we will see to it that your $3 rate of duty on lumber is taken off if you do not 'come across.'"

Mr. President, I think that is an exaggeration; I do not believe they would go that far. I think it is a scandalous exaggeration; and I would not dare say such a thing if the Democratic Party in 1932 had not gone all over this land making people believe that that was true of the Republican Party; but if they were justified in making that statement with respect to what the Republican Party did, I say when they obtain 5 times, 10 times, 100 times more power than the Republicans had over their tariff measure, I have the same right to predict that somewhere along the line they will use the same kind of argument.

But, Mr. President, the Democratic handbook goes on and tells us what the Democratic theory is. Let us see what it is, and let us see how nearly they are carrying it out under this proposed act:

> The Democratic theory of tariff taxation is based upon the necessity of providing revenues to the Government—

"Necessity of providing revenues to the Government." At a time when the President estimates that there will be a deficit of $7,300,000,000, they need to provide revenue for the Government—> hence the phrase "a tariff for revenue only"—and providing fair competition between imported and domestic products, without injury to the legitimate domestic industries, and safeguarding of interests of labor.

Bear in mind "a tariff for revenue only"; then go through those documents and see what Secretary Hull's idea is about the tariff. When one reads the speeches made in 1929 and 1932 he cannot help but reach the conclusion that Secretary Hull has in his mind free trade, not "a tariff for revenue only"; and he cannot help but also reach the conclusion that when this bill shall have been passed he will have been given the opportunity—the first opportunity anybody has had in this country for generations—to establish for this country free trade; free as was ever known in any country in the world. As I pointed out yesterday, he will have been given the authority to destroy the tariff, and with that authority, if he has the inclination to do it, he will reach the conclusion that it is to the best interest of the country to destroy it.

And providing fair competition between imported and domestic products, without injury to legitimate domestic industries, and safeguarding of interests of labor.

I ask my friends on the other side, many of whom voted as I voted in considering the Tariff Act of 1930, many of whom joined with me in behalf of particular interests which I thought ought to be protected—I ask them if under all these circumstances, bearing in mind the attitude of those who are going to administer this proposed law, if they are willing to pass this great power on to one individual, hoping for the best? I ask those who are interested in oil, I ask those who are interested in lumber, I ask those who are interested in copper, if they believed it was necessary to impose tariff duties on those commodities to save those industries, what hope have they now? They have no hope at all, I submit, except their influence with the Executive and his assistants.

The present Democratic attitude on the tariff is expressed as follows in the national platform adopted at Chicago.

Mr. President, I beg of those who believe in platforms, I beg of those who read the emphasis the Democrats have placed on the importance of platform declarations, to compare this provision in their platform with the bill now pending before the Senate:

We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference—

What did they mean by "Executive interference"? I got the distinct impression that "Executive interference" there meant that the Executive was able, by some kind of manipulation, to control the tariff rates and they wanted to get rid of such "Executive interference." It is true they do not want "Executive interference" any more; it is true they want to get rid of "Executive interference." They want Executive control, and they want to get rid of congressional interference. That is what they are doing by this proposed act. They want to get rid of congressional interference and confine the tariff solely to Executive edict—

Reciprocal tariff agreements with other nations, and an international economic conference designed to restore international trade and facilitate exchange.

A fact-finding tariff commission, like that referred to in this plank of the Democratic platform, was established in the administration of Woodrow Wilson to supply information to the President and the Congress concerning possible changes in rates, to enable the President to recommend and the Congress to enact such changes. In the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act, which became a law during the Harding administration, on September 21, 1922, a clause was adopted authorizing the Executive to increase or lower tariff rates 50 percent upon the recommendation of the Tariff Commission. This clause, known as the "flexible clause", was adopted under the false pretense that it would be repealed as soon as international trade conditions became normal. The inference was plainly given that its adoption was for the purpose of lowering excessive rates during that period of chaotic economic conditions, and not for increasing them. This pretense was long ago abandoned, and the Republicans perpetuated the flexible clause in the existing Hawley-Smoot Act, with the power to change rates 50 percent in the hands of the President. The last Congress passed an act restoring the rate-making power to Congress, which was vetoed by President Hoover.

From reading that statement, do you not get the clear impression, if the Democrats got control of the Congress and the Executive, that the very first thing they would do would be to repeal the flexible provision of the Tariff Act? But now, with full control, after having given it deliberate consideration, after having demanded that that be done, they are about to bestow on the President greater authority than was ever given to any President at any time; and they leave deliberately in the bill the very same flexible provision which formerly they so strongly condemned. Despite all the talk we have heard and all we have had to say about it, not a word of reply can we get from the other side of the Chamber as to why it is there. I hope before we get rid of the bill, before we dispose of some of the amendments, we will be able to induce the Chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. HARRISON] to make at least one more speech, for we all enjoy his speeches, and became accustomed to them prior to his party securing control here. Then we heard much from him, but since that time and since he has become the head of the Finance Committee we find him very meager in his speech-making and very much lacking in his explanation of the inconsistencies which those on the other side of the Chamber now indicate by their acts with respect to the tariff.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to intimate that he wants the Senator from Mississippi to be consistent on the tariff?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; I am just pointing out a few of his inconsistencies.

Mr. President, following my remarks I desire to have certain parts of certain speeches of certain Senators printed in the RECORD. Among them is a speech—a very eloquent speech, indeed—by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] protesting against the flexible provision of the tariff. He has consisently opposed it. He condemned the Republican Party for adopting it, and made, as he always does, a very fine speech. I am not placing that speech in the RECORD for the purpose of showing that the Senator from Idaho is either consistent or inconsistent. I have stated that he has been constantly consistent. I am placing that speech in the RECORD because it was delivered in this body in September 1929, shortly after the effort had been begun to "smear" Hoover. That speech of the Senator from Idaho was in opposition to the position taken by the President with respect to the flexible provision of the tariff.

The point about it is that it made such a good Democratic document that the Democratic National Committee had 50,000 copies of it printed and distributed over the land.

Mr. President, the speeches to which I have referred, which I have carefully read, opposing the flexible provision of the tariff, have in these days, to my mind, a very distinct value with respect to the power that is constantly being given to the President. I think there is no more of a social reformer in this body than the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. If I were to be compelled to name the man in the Senate who comes nearest to being a member of the "brain trust", I should undoubtedly select the junior Senator from New York. He made a speech on October 1, 1929, a most carefully prepared speech. There are a few paragraphs which I should like to read in order that I may refresh the recollection of Senators as to the nature of the debate going on in the Senate at that time. The Senator said:

There have been in every tariff act commodities from which Congress deliberately withheld the full measure of duty based on relative cost differences for the benefit of the consumers. Under the flexible provision the President may impose the duty which had been deliberately withheld by Congress and flout the will of the legislature.

Let us not forget that this incomparable power—to enrich or impoverish, to build an industry or cut it down, to remake the economic geography of our country—all this power is placed in the hands of a man who is not only President but the head of a political party.

Does he use it with an eye to what is politically discreet? In the table of Presidential proclamations which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I notice that the 14th day of May 1929 was a particularly busy one. The House tariff bill had just been brought in and words of protest were heard from widely scattered sections of the country. In the Senate the debenture debate was ruffling many tempers. That afternoon there appeared a brief Presidential announcement which proclaimed an increase of tariff on flaxseed, on milk and cream, and on plate glass. I offer no criticism of these increases, but I call attention to the interesting geographical allotment—flaxseed for the Northwest, milk and cream for the Northeast, and, of course, the good State of Pennsylvania was not forgotten. It may be that all this was pure coincidence. Yet it is true that the distribution of this soothing sirup was peculiarly well timed. It is hard to believe that there was not a hurried search in Tariff Commission pigeonholes to find the appropriately mollifying reports to suit the political exigencies of the day. There was a prophetic note in the headline which appeared in the New York Times on the morning of May 14, 1929. It read, "Party wrangles in Senate curbed by Hoover tactics."

Mr. President, we are about to vote on the flexible-tariff provision, and it is appropriate that the precise limits of the issue between the President and the opponents of the Executive tariff should be clearly defined.

After the Tariff Commission has made an investigation and recommended a change in duty, who is to enact that recommendation into law? The President takes the position that he alone is competent to act with the necessary dispatch to afford adequate relief. It is my view that if a new duty is to become effective, if a greater tax burden is to be imposed upon the people of the United States, the change must secure both congressional and Presidential approval, as in the case of the enactment of every other law. The issue is not between a flexible and an inflexible tariff; the true line of division is between an Executive tariff and a congressional tariff.

Mr. President, I call attention to these facts for the sole purpose of showing that in the debate from which I have read it was constantly urged upon the country that the flexible provision of the tariff was not being honestly used; that it was being used for political purposes; yet if we dare make any suggestion here with respect to an improper use of the very much greater power that is proposed to be given to the President of the United States under the pending bill, I have no doubt that we shall be charged with being unpatriotic and injecting into the debate a question of partisan politics which ought not to be there.

Mr. President, if there be no objection, I should like to have printed in the RECORD the parts of speeches I have selected which were made in that debate. I had expected to read them; but if there be no objection to inserting them at the end of my remarks, I shall not detain the Senate longer but shall conclude my remarks at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Sept. 25, 1929]

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senate has listened today to an unusual address by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], an address which, if followed carefully and closely and impartially, will demonstrate that the Tariff Commission under any administration is necessarily a partisan Commission; that the Tariff Commission cannot function under the present provision of law under any administration, Democratic or Republican, unless its recommendations accord with the political views of the Executive on the controverted question of the tariff. If the history of the Commission is examined with care, as it has been detailed by the Senator from Wisconsin in his address today, it must be conceded that the whole controversial question, a question upon which the political parties and men within political parties have differed from the beginning, and which is as acute today as it has been at any time in our history, cannot possibly be settled if the recommendations and findings of the Commission are adverse to the firmly held views of the Chief Executive.

It would be impossible to suppose the election of any man as Chief Executive of the Nation who did not have firmly fixed and even unyielding opinions upon the question of the tariff. It would be impossible to suppose the election of any man who did not have a firmly fixed and even unyielding opinion upon the oldest economic question, yet unsettled, before the American people. It is not only a question old with us but it is a question which likewise challenges the attention and disturbs the thought of statesmen in every land and under every form of government. How, therefore, can it be assumed that the history of any tariff commission will be other than the sordid story recited by the Senator from Wisconsin today when it is remembered that every recommendation of the Commission on any matter of vital importance must meet with the definite and positive rejection of the Executive unless the recommendation accords with the views of the Executive?

Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin in the course of his address made reference to President Hoover's appearance in the tariff debate. This extraordinary session of the Congress was called primarily for the purpose of giving relief to agriculture. Yet when the 12 leading farm organizations of the country, in a letter dated the 8th day of this month, complained that the tariff bill which had passed the House and which had come to the Senate, and which had the approval of the Senate Finance Committee, not only did not give relief but widened the present disparity between general industry and agriculture, Mr. Hoover was as silent as the tomb.

In every newspaper in the country at all independent in character the tariff bill now under consideration has been subjected to the severest attacks. In every section of the country it has been pointed out that the measure does not give relief to agriculture—and that has been the judgment of those who believed it possible to give relief in large measure through the tariff and of those who believed it to be impossible to aid very many of the chief or staple or important farm products through the tariff. And yet in the midst of the condemnation heaped upon the tariff measure now before us, in the midst of public criticism of it, by men and newspapers alike, through the many months that it has been before the public, Mr. Hoover has remained as silent as the tomb.

He threw himself into the tariff breach yesterday, and it is worthy of notice that he threw himself into that breach not when farm products were at stake, not when farm rates were involved, but when the chief demand of the highest protected interests in the country was believed to be in danger, to wit, the flexible provision of the tariff. Then he spoke. He found his accustomed boldness, the same boldness that sustained him in his direct fight against the farm bill itself when representatives of the farmer dared to write into it the debenture plan. Then he spoke. Though the Congress has been called to grant relief to agriculture, he has raised his voice but twice—once in direct opposition to what the farmers of the country wanted and again when the great industrial groups, not the farmers, were being hard pressed on the particular ground which to them means more than any rate of duty written into the bill. Then he spoke on the flexible provision.

There had been speculation in the country—speculation inspired no doubt, by the great respect in which men hold the Chief Executive of the Nation—concerning Mr. Hoover's position on the tariff. His silence, especially in view of two notable instances when he has broken it, indicates his complete acquiescence in every provision of the bill, or at least that he does not regard any provision as of sufficient importance to justify his assault upon it. However, the moment that the flexible-tariff provision is threatened, the moment that issue comes before the Senate, then Mr. Hoover in the second division of the special session called for the relief of agriculture, throws himself into the tariff discussion.

Here is the letter of the representatives of the 12 great farm organizations of America, calling attention to the absolute failure of those who believe in applying the protective principle to agriculture. Here is the letter of Mr. Gray, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, specifically charging that the disparity between general industry and agriculture has not only not been bridged but that it has been widened by the bill now before the Senate. Yet not once did the President of the United States deem it advisable or proper to raise his voice in this tariff discussion. Not only has the President now raised his voice but his statement is a most remarkable one. He is not a new convert to the theory of the flexible provision in the tariff; he long has favored it. He favored it when it was enacted in 1922. It was then highly important; it is now more important. Though the troublous conditions which then prevailed have largely disappeared, though the world has moved away from the turmoil and the disturbance incident to the World War, it is now more important, and two reasons are assigned for its increasing importance. The first is that no tariff is perfect. The President seems to anticipate that the pending tariff act will be very bad, that none can be perfect.

It is therefore necessary at all times to have someone or some commission clothed with the power to correct the mistakes of the Congress. The second reason is that in view of rapidly changing economic conditions at home and abroad it is more necessary now than it was in 1922 to retain the flexible provision in this proposed act.

The argument that it is more necessary at this time to retain that provision stands upon those two premises. I submit that the first cannot be urged with more justification than it could have been urged at the time of the enactment of the first tariff back in the early days of the Republic. Rapidly changing economic conditions at home and abroad do not any more justify the continuance or emphasize the necessity for the retention of the flexible tariff provision than the same relatively rapidly changing conditions at any time or at any particular period in our history have justified the enactment of such a provision.

The President then proceeds in his statement to remind us that under the flexible provision of the tariff the initiative is not with the President but that it is with the Commission of its own accord or upon the motion of some interested party; and he asserts that he cannot do anything with reference to the tariff until the Commission shall have acted, until it shall have submitted its recommendations; that the Commission, of course, is an independent body and not subject to Executive control.

Already the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has well answered that assertion, and has answered it in the only logical way that the answer can be made, by the simple recital of the history of the Tariff Commission since the day of the passage and approval of the flexible provision of the tariff. The President of the United States has the power to appoint the members of the Commission; under the decision in the case of Myers against the United States he has the power to remove every member of the Commission; and the history of the Commission has certainly illustrated the subserviency of the Commission under both Presidents; and it cannot well be otherwise.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that Mr. Hoover's predecessor in the Executive Office announced from the White House that these commissions were intended to reflect the Executive will.

Mr. GEORGE. I now remember, since my attention has been called to it by the Senator from Virginia, that that statement was made.

Mr. President, without any disposition unduly to criticize the President who went out of office on March 4 last, or to level any criticism against the character of the present occupant of the Presidential office, I desire to say that it is perfectly plain that President Coolidge did undertake to control and did control, in accordance with his announced purpose and intention, the Tariff Commission by controlling the appointments to that Commission.

It is already clear that Mr. Hoover, great administrator as he is, and familiar with the problems of administration, is not seeking so much to control the Tariff Commission through appointments as he is seeking to control the Commission through the control of key men in every position on that Commission. Even since the present session of Congress reconvened it is a matter of common rumor that an interested manufacturer, who thought that some information had come to the minority members of the Finance Committee helpful to a reduction of tariff rates, had actually appealed to the President to remove a particular and very capable expert in the Commission. As a matter of justice to the administration, I wish to add that that expert has not been removed; but under the pressure of business, before whose eyes are dangled what a former Senator from Missouri, the Honorable James A. Reed, used to call "money bribes" in the form of tariff duties—under that pressure Mr. Hoover undoubtedly will control the Tariff Commission by the placing of key men in all important positions in the Commission, who will reflect his economic views upon the long-controverted question of the tariff. I do not mean to say that a Democrat would not do likewise; indeed, the argument that I make might be as well made under a Democratic administration as under a Republican administration.

Further in his statement Mr. Hoover reminds us that the flexible provision of the tariff has not hitherto been made a political issue. The flexible provision, in its present form, of course, went into the act in 1922. That provision has been the subject of discussion from time to time since its enactment.

Finally, a case was made in the Supreme Court of the United States involving the validity of the act. The question has never been at rest. The President possibly means that the repeal or retention of the flexible provision has not been a partisan issue. Indeed, it has not been, because there have always been men on both sides of the aisle who believed that the flexible provision of the tariff should not have been enacted and ought now to be repealed; liberal men of all parties believe that it was a mistake to enact it and that it ought now to be repealed.

What is the necessity for the flexible provision of the tariff law? Is it to lower rates? Can it be imagined that any very serious economic harm will come to the country merely because it is found that a rate of duty is slightly too high upon a given commodity or any number of commodities? Certainly the necessity to continue the flexible provision of the tariff does not spring from the demand for a reduction of rates. It, therefore, can come but from one quarter; the demand for the flexible provision can be regarded as imperatively necessary only by those who are seeking to raise the duties upon imports. What serious harm can come to the American people through a delay even for the period of 1 or 2 or 8 years—the outside limit indicated by the President in his newspaper statement yesterday—in raising a rate of duty? If the particular commodity is representative of a great industry of the country, it is not conceivable that the Congress could not be convened and the attention of Congress directed to that particular matter.

In 1921 there was a revision of the tariff, limited very largely, which resulted in what was known as the "Emergency Tariff Act." In the very next year we had a general revision of the tariff. If the President would follow more consistently the policy and program of bringing to the attention of Congress by special message needed revision of the tariff within narrow limits, it by no means appears that the criticism made by the President is justified, to wit, that there cannot be a limited revision of the tariff; that Congress will take excursions into all of the schedules whenever the tariff is opened up. If that be true, then the President never intended a limited revision of the tariff on behalf of agriculture when he called the present extraordinary session of Congress. If, as he now asserts, there can be no such thing as a limited revision of the tariff, that a limited revision means a general revision—and that is the premise upon which he bases his contention that it is necessary to continue in operation the flexible provision of the tariff—if that be true, then I add to the statement which I at first made and say that the pending tariff bill has met the approval of the administration from the beginning; and not only that, but, on the logic of the President himself, he knew that a general revision of the tariff was not only inevitable but a general revision was invited when he issued his proclamation calling the extra session of Congress.

President Hoover is advancing the arguments that have been heard in one form or another at one time or another from those who distrust popular government and who deny the capacity of the people to regulate and govern their affairs through servants and representatives selected by them. If the Congress of the United States cannot be trusted to make needed revision of the tariff whenever our rapidly changing economic conditions make it imperative to do so, then popular government, the capacity of men to govern themselves with respect to this, the most important political action that can be taken by a people, is denied or at least is questioned.

Finally, the President yesterday said that "the flexible provision is one of the most progressive steps taken in tariff making in all of our history." The most progressive step taken in tariff making in all of our history! It is distinctly and decidedly a backward step; it is a step backward toward vesting in the Executive the power to levy and to collect taxes out of the pockets of the people. If that be progress, we made a fearful mistake when we brought on the Revolution, and spilled so much blood and spent so much money to establish, once and for all time, the principle that the taxing power must remain in the people, to be exercised only by representatives most directly accountable and responsible to the people.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the Chief Executive of this Nation is elected by the people, as Members of the Congress are elected by the people. I am not unmindful of the fact that the Chief Executive is responsible to the people just as Members of the Congress are responsible to the people. I am not discussing the matter upon that basis but upon the broad basis that the unnecessary concentration of power in the executive branch of the Government is a step toward monarchy, whatever be the form of government under which the monarch exists.

"One of the most progressive steps taken in tariff making in all of our history" is the final verdict of the President.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject, will he suffer an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission I should like to emphasize a pertinent point raised by him. The Senator has called attention to the failure of the President to make any comment upon the pending tariff bill until yesterday. He has reminded us of the statement of the leader upon the Republican side [Mr. Watson] to the effect that the President had not taken any part in the questions involved in the pending bill, or in any controversies growing out of the same, and would pursue this course until Congress had acted upon the measure. The Senator challenged attention to the fact that upon the agricultural schedules, which are vital to the farmers of the country, the President had not spoken during the consideration of the bill in the House or thus far in the Senate.

In my opinion, the President acted wisely and with a due regard to the rights and authority of Congress in the consideration of this bill; but yesterday, notwithstanding the assurances of the leader of the majority that the President would maintain his attitude of silence, the President gave to the press a rather formidable statement upon the most important feature in the whole bill. When it was proposed in the Senate to strike from the bill the provision dealing with the flexible tariff, then the President apparently became deeply concerned. This provision confers upon the President power to increase duties and, in effect, to exercise legislative authority. In my opinion, the flexible provision was unconstitutional and conferred upon the President power which should never have been delegated and which no Executive should possess.

Apparently the President's interest is aroused when an effort is made to restrict Executive authority, to circumscribe his power, and to confine to the legislative branch of the Government—where it should be confined—the power and the responsibility to fix tariff rates, which means the laying of taxes upon the people. I regret exceedingly that the President has felt constrained to take the course indicated by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. It is confirmatory of what all thoughtful men must have felt at the time of the passage of this act—that notwithstanding his high personal character, the Chief Executive of the Nation, without regard to his political views or his party alinements, would seek to hold fast to the power, once it was granted. Here, in the midst of a tariff battle, and under circumstances that call for a straightforward declaration by the Executive if circumstances ever called for such declaration, there is silence, continued silence, until the power vested in the Chief Executive is sought to be taken away or circumscribed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, this tariff bill was prepared in the House Ways and Means Committee after long hearings; and it was a matter of common report, at least, that after the completion of the bill it was carried to the White House by its author, the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the Speaker of the House, the leader of the majority party, and the Chairman of the Rules Committee of the House; and yet there was not a word said. At that time, Mr. President, I will not say the bill was more in accord with the views of the President, but it was not sufficiently out of harmony with the views of the President to evoke a condemnation of it in any particular; and it was more in accord with the wishes of those who desired to write and to perpetuate practically beyond the power of Congress to control them the highest rates ever written in a tariff bill in our history.

When this bill went to the floor of the House, when it came to the Senate and was referred to the Senate Finance Committee, it contained a remarkable provision. Under section 402 of the bill it was provided that in selecting the base for the valuation of imported merchandise, the foreign or import value, whichever was higher, should be taken, as in existing law; that if the foreign or import value could not be found to the satisfaction of the appraiser, then the United States value should be taken; that if the United States value could not be found to the satisfaction of the appraiser, in that event production cost, or in certain circumstances the American selling price, should be taken. Not only was that true, but there was written into the bill the provision that the decision of the appraiser determining the base on which merchandise should be valued should be final unless an appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Treasury. Beyond the Secretary of the Treasury the appeal could not go. The right of the citizen could not be reviewed in the courts.

The Senate Finance Committee struck out that provision of the bill, be it said to the credit of the committee. We are well justified in asking whether that provision is dead or whether it only sleepeth, because it was in the bill when it came from the House; it was in the bill when it went to the Finance Committee; it was in the bill when and if the bill was presented to the Executive for his inspection, as was generally reported at an earlier day in the consideration of this bill.

That provision is mainly desired by those who do not hesitate to say that they have the right to demand an embargo in the home market, and who seek an embargo in tariff legislation at this time. If once the American selling price is taken as the basis upon which to compute the duty upon articles imported into this country, every exorbitant price, every monopoly price, every price fixed by an uneconomic industry existing in this country will be perpetuated. If that should happen, it would make little difference what rates were established. If the basis on which the rates are to be calculated is given over into the hands of the American manufacturer or producer, importations will virtually cease. Be it said to the credit of the present chairman of the committee that in 1922 and at this time he has stood unfalteringly against that provision and against that demand.

Not only, Mr. President, was this provision—which I will not longer discuss—in the bill when it passed the House and came over to the Senate, but section 330 called for the reorganization of the Tariff Commission, the other point of vital interest to those who so much desire the American selling price as the basis of value for the fixing or calculation of import duties.

It was provided that the Commission should be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the President without regard to the political views of the members; in other words, that the bipartisan character of the Commission should be destroyed. Be it said to the credit and to the honor of the majority members of the Finance Committee of the Senate that provision was stricken out of this bill; but, again, I ask my distinguished friend, the chairman of the committee, whether that amendment is dead or only sleepeth?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. All I can say is, that so far as I am personally concerned, it is dead.

Mr. GEORGE. I am delighted to have that assurance from the chairman of the committee.

Not only was there a provision for the reorganization of the Commission, for the making of a partisan Commission in terms, but there was inserted section 336 in lieu of section 315 of the act of 1922; that is to say, there was a complete change of the so-called "flexible provision" of the tariff act. The majority members of the Senate Finance Committee at first accepted that provision, not unanimously, I am glad again to say; but the Finance Committee by a majority vote of the Republican members of that committee accepted the new flexible provision which substituted equalization of competitive conditions for the present basis of the equalization of cost of production.

At first that provision, as I have just said, had the approval of the majority of the majority; but subsequently and at this time the majority members have presented what is in effect the present law with two particular changes, one of them exceedingly important: the other, as I think, not so important. The change has already been pointed out; but it is well enough to emphasize that the first change which we may notice is that the President now is to make his recommendations upon and is to await the findings of the Tariff Commission before he can proceed to act under the flexible provision. The second change is the definition of transportation costs, freights. That is an important provision of this amendment, and one that I shall not discuss this afternoon. I shall discuss briefly the general policy, without going into the particular provisions of the flexible tariff, and particularly into the definition of transportation cost as it now appears in the bill.

First, however, I desire to say that the last platform adopted by the political party represented by those of us on this side of the aisle declared for the—

"Abolition of logrolling and restoration of the Wilson conception of a fact-finding Tariff Commission, quasi judicial and free from the Executive domination which has destroyed the usefulness of the present Commission."

That was the demand in the platform of the party.

* * * * * * *

In two other instances where decreases were ordered the American selling price was continued by the Commission.

Mr. President, I have already called attention to the fact that the present basis of the flexible tariff is equalization of costs of production in the United States and the chief competing country, while the proposed basis in the House bill is the equalization of competitive conditions.

The amendment of the flexible-tariff provision in the way proposed in the House bill would have reopened the question of its constitutionality. It may have been held unconstitutional if the basis were such an indefinite rule as was laid down in the House bill. Practically all the difficulties encountered in the administration of section 315 of the present law would still remain if equalization of competitive conditions had been adhered to as inserted in the House bill.

An attempt to analyze the phrase "equalization of competitive conditions" in the light of experience in administering the flexible tariff shows the rule to be unworkable and reveals conflicts of opinion certain to arise, and affords ample justification for the rejection of that basis by the majority members of the Senate Finance Committee.

Finally, and with this I am through with the House provision upon this question, the rule of equalization of competitive conditions involves, and necessarily involves, the exercise of judgment as to what is good or sound public policy.

Chief Justice Taft said in the Hampton case, in the case in which the validity of the flexible provision was sustained by the Supreme Court, that—

"The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce, by declaring the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates, and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with its provisions, the fixing of such rates, justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise."

It is not my purpose here or hereafter, Mr. President, to discuss the constitutionality of the flexible provision. That question has been foreclosed by the decision of the Supreme Court. But I do pause to say that there is no just analogy between the power given the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix freight tariffs or rates and the power given the Tariff Commission to raise or lower tariff duties within the limits prescribed by the act. There is no just analogy in point of fact or in point of history.

The power to fix freight rates was and is a judicial power in the sense that no rate can be exacted and collected by a common carrier of goods, passengers, or merchandise that is unreasonable and unjust. It was and had been from time immemorial an acknowledged jurisdiction of common-law courts to regulate freight rates. Yet the Supreme Court of the United States draws the analogy between the just and reasonable extension and application of a judicial power now vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the power vested in the Tariff Commission to lower or to raise the tax, the import tax, which never has been the subject matter of review by any court established by English-speaking peoples.

Fundamentally the decision is unsound. It is based upon an unsound premise. It is based upon an indefensible premise. The rate-making power given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, says the Supreme Court, is the analogy upon which the like power to tax can be vested in a tariff commission.

Before we had an Interstate Commerce Commission, it was expressly ruled by the court, in recognition of an indisputable principle, that the rate-making power with respect to common carriers was a part of the jurisdiction of common-law courts, a part of the jurisdiction of ordinary courts of law. You could not make an unjust rate, or the court would strike it down. You could not make a rate that was against the public interest, because when the public policy of the State was declared, the contract contrary to the policy had to be declared invalid, and it was later held by the court, even after the passage of the Hepburn Act, speaking through its great Chief Justice—Mr. Chief Justice White—that the power to make the rate yet resided in the carrier. That rate, when made, had to be tested by the Commission in the application of the judicial power then vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, as strong as my attachment to our Supreme Court is, back of every freight rate stands the Constitution, stands the Supreme Court of this land, and no unjust rate can be imposed upon the public, nor can a confiscatory rate be imposed upon the common carrier. But the Constitution and the Court do not stand back of the action of the Tariff Commission. The power of the Commission is absolute. One is a political power, and never has been anything else but a political power since it was taken from the Executive, the king. The other is a judicial power, and never has been anything but a judicial power.

Yet the analogy is between the extension of the common-law jurisdiction of common-law courts to a body known as the "Interstate Commerce Commission", subject to the control of the courts, on the one hand, and the granting of the power to tax the money out of the pockets of the citizens, on the other hand, to a Tariff Commission and the President of the United States, a power which the President of the United States, even at this early day, unwilling to release, pleads for in the public press of yesterday.

Mr. President, the principal difficulties which have been encountered in the application of the rule of difference in cost of production at home and abroad may be summarized as follows. I summarize without elaborating at this time.

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, when we consider the peculiar difficulties that have arisen in the administration of flexible tariff, some of which I have enumerated, we must arrive at the conclusion that the Tariff Commission reaches its conclusions by no other process and upon no other basis and upon no other consideration than ought to be used by Members of the Congress in writing a tariff schedule or fixing a particular duty.

Let me quote from William McKinley, back in 1882, on the floor of the House, when he was speaking about an advisory tariff commission, in character very much like the commission now proposed by the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons]. Mr. McKinley said:

"I cannot refrain from saying that we are taking a new and somewhat hazardous step in delegating a duty that we ought ourselves to perform—a duty confided to us by the Constitution, and to no others. It is true that a commission does not legislate and therefore its work may or may not be adopted by Congress. This is the safety of the proposition."

He was speaking of an advisory commission.

Now let me read the always pointed language of that always practical Republican statesman, Thomas B. Reed, long the Speaker of the House of Representatives, from the North American Review, December 1902. This is the answer to any kind of a flexible tariff administered by any commission, however selected. Mr. Reed said:

"But we can have sitting in perpetual session a body of men, nonpartisans, judicious, wise, and incorruptible. Yes; in your mind. You can have anything in your mind. Imagination is unlimited and it is very delightful to wander around among impossible possibilities. Just think of a nonpartisan free trader sitting on a tariff tax. Of course, he would be above any prejudice except his own." And I agree with Mr. Reed, "I saw one Tariff Commission sit in 1882 and its report was not enacted into law. All its mistakes were, and the result was satisfactory to nobody."

Is the Tariff Commission satisfactory to anybody? It is satisfactory to nobody, without any reflection upon the men who now compose the Commission, except those special interests that will as certainly aim to control it as night follows the day. It has been the history of the special tribunals vested with great power over business and industry that they fall ultimately into the hands of the powerful.

I myself have had occasion to change my own views upon this important phase of the question. Trained as I have been in the service of the courts and with a strong attachment and love and respect for the courts and for our judicial system, I have likened in my mind these special tribunals to our courts. But they are not courts, fortified by the traditions surrounding our courts. The tariff, whether good, bad, or indifferent, holds a money bribe before the eyes of the industry that can get its rates, and the industry under the influence of this bribe will one day control any special tribunal set up to administer its affairs and to pass upon and to control its destinies. I do not wish to be understood as aiming personal criticism at some of the men who now serve and who have served upon the Commission. I might do it, but I do not want to inject that into my argument.

It has been recited how at least one commissioner found no impropriety in sitting in a case in which his nearest relative by marriage, his wife, was directly interested until it became a matter of public notice, and he was finally persuaded to desist. Another member of that Commission was at first a lobbyist for pottery interests, then a member of the Commission, and now a lobbyist for pottery interests, verifying the adage and axiom. "Once a lobbyist always a lobbyist"; for he said before the committee that he was not here in the interest of anyone but merely in the interest of the public good. Then another member of the Commission, taken from the chairmanship of the Home Market League of Boston, transferred the fervor of his former calling as a minister of the gospel, I believe, to the service of special interests that demand protection, which to the fullest extent that lay within the power of Thomas Marvin have obtained it in every case considered by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to say something—and I hope to be brief—upon the merits of this proposition aside from what I deem to be its practical features as I have been discussing them. First, what is the extent and nature of the power which we are asked to delegate? I venture to say that there has never been anything like these proposals in the history of the United States; there is no precedent for them. There has never been an instance in which the Congress of the United States has undertaken to delegate any such power prior to the time when these delegations were proposed. They are without parallel or precedent in our history.

This is the House provision:

"In order to put into force and effect the policy of Congress by this act intended, the President shall investigate the differences in conditions of competition in the principal market or markets of the United States between domestic articles and like or similar competitive imported articles."

Mr. President, that covers every function, every intellectual effort that may be involved upon the part of the legislator when he writes duties in a bill of this character. There is first an effort made to ascertain the facts. They are ascertained, we will assume, as nearly accurately as practicable; but we all know that accuracy in that matter is simply impossible.

When the facts are ascertained, then comes the exercise of the judgment of the party who is to lay the duty. What is equality of competition as it is mentioned here? Into that enters transportation. Into that enters the conditions of the people in other countries. Into that enters labor. Into that enters the kind of government under which the people live, and the opportunity which they have to develop their individual initiative. Into that enters everything, and when that is finished at last, the party reflects and determines what in his judgment is equality of competition. When he has determined it, he establishes a rule, which is a rule of conduct for every citizen in the United States. In other words, he establishes a duty and it becomes the law of the United States, a rule of conduct which is the test of legislation.

Of course the Congress has the power to pass a law providing for certain contingencies. The law must be complete within itself. Congress also has the power in a law to provide that upon the ascertainment of certain facts, and the facts being promulgated, the law shall operate in this or that way; but the law must be complete. That which is necessary for a complete rule of conduct must be there.

The only thing Congress can delegate is the simple duty of ascertaining whether this or that particular fact is true, but when they attempt to delegate power to exercise judgment, or to reflect upon a proposition, or to determine a policy, and to write that into a rule that will become the law of the land, that is a power which, in my judgment, it is far from the power of the Congress to delegate; that is legislating, that is lawmaking, something we cannot delegate.

In the amendment offered by the able Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] it is provided that the President shall determine the difference between the costs of production at home and abroad. The House committee determined that that could not be done, that the results would be inaccurate and uncertain, that there was no way to arrive at that with any degree of accuracy. Hence, they declared that it was necessary to adopt a different standard, and, in my opinion, it is impossible to make such determination. But the exercise of those attributes of mind, those elements of mind, of reflection and judgment, are essential in the determination of both propositions.

Let us assume that when the Tariff Commission made a report it would make it to the Congress. What would the Congress do? The Congress would take the facts, ascertain as nearly as it could the conditions according to the facts, and then in its judgment write into the law what it deemed to be a proper duty under the circumstances.

What does the President do? He takes the report of the Tariff Commission, and, as shown by President Coolidge, he exercises his own judgment upon it. He does not say, "These facts show this as a mathematical proposition, and therefore I issue the proclamation." He says, "This does not appeal to me. This is not according to sound policy. This is not according to my judgment. Reflecting upon this matter I will do it," or "I will not do it." That is precisely what the Congress should do. The result of our action in both instances is precisely the same.

Mr. President, secondly, what power is it to which this delegation of power will relate? It is the power of taxation, it is the power of raising revenue, a power which has fundamentally, basically, peculiarly belonged to the legislative function in Anglo-Saxon history from its beginning. It is the most ancient of all legislative prerogatives. It comes down from the first meetings of the great council of the realm. There has been one power from which the Anglo-Saxon people have never been willing to divorce themselves, even under the most exacting conditions, or the most determined dominancy of great kings, and that is the power to raise revenue, the power to levy taxes. Yet, if we accept the argument of the President as he presented it on Tuesday, we are transferring to the Commission and to the President the power to say what duties shall be, and determine what taxes, if any, shall be levied, and what law shall obtain.

Mr. President, suppose we passed a bill here saying that every man should pay an income tax according to his ability to pay, and then appointed a commission to determine the facts, and authorized the President to determine the amount of the tax. If this provision here is sound, in my judgment that would be a power which we would be entitled to delegate, and a power which the President could exercise.

The true rule in regard to this, I believe, was stated by the President in his campaign. I had put this aside for reference before I read the President's statement on Tuesday, and I do not care to turn aside from my intended remarks, because while it may or may not express the President's view at this time it expresses mine. The President said:

"The Tariff Commission is a most valuable arm of the Government."

With that I agree. I would be glad to have a tariff commission with as nearly quasi-judicial powers as possible, to ascertain the facts and to have in mind, when they are ascertaining the facts, nothing but the ascertainment of the facts, and to report those facts to the law-making body and the tax-levying power of the United States, which is the Congress.

"It can be strengthened and made more useful in several ways. But the American people will never consent to delegating authority over the tariff to any commission, whether nonpartisan or bipartisan."

If this does not delegate that power, I cannot understand human language.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, what was the date of that speech?

Mr. BORAH. October 15.

Mr. MCKELLAR. 1928?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. He continued:

"Our people have a right to express themselves at the ballot upon so vital a question at this."

Quite right. It is fundamental. The people have a right to say, when they are voting for their Senator or their Representative, what their view is and what their policy is with reference to tariff, free trade, tariff for revenue, protection, ample or less ample.

That is something, in the language of the President properly construed, that can never be delegated to an irresponsible body. I say "irresponsible." I mean irresponsible to the people themselves—a body which they cannot select, elect, recall, or control. Upon the question of how much tax they shall pay, they have a right to vote. If not upon that question, pray what question would be interesting to the people?

There is a disposition in this country to transfer all power which is a vexing and troublesome power to some commission. It makes campaigns more agreeable. It shunts responsibility and avoids criticism—

"There is only one commission to which delegation of that authority can be made. That is the great commission of their own choosing, the Congress of the United States and the President. It is the only commission which can be held responsible to the electorate."

What does that language mean? It means that the people are not willing to part with the power of laying taxes and to delegate it away from those of their own choosing. That has been the fundamental principle of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence and Anglo-Saxon history from the first meeting of a legislative body. Kings have lost their heads in contending for this power, and men have been willing to die that the people be not deprived of the right themselves to elect those who are to lay upon them the taxes.

There is no subject over which government assumes to exercise authority of more concern to the government and citizen alike than the subject of taxation. When the citizen faces the government in the matter of taxes he is practically helpless, save when he chooses to appeal to the sovereign right of revolution. The tax which the government exacts he must pay. To pay it may imperil or ruin his business; it may take the roof from over his family; it may impoverish his children and deny them the advantages of education; but the will of the government is supreme and remorseless. Taxation has a thrilling history. It is the bravest and also the sorriest chapter in the history of the English-speaking race. It is the story of liberty, of free and independent citizenship; a story, in short, of free institutions. This the fathers understood quite as well as we understand it.

And this the fathers heeded far better than we seem disposed to do. How carefully, how persistently, they undertook to place the power of raising revenue, of imposing taxes, where it was least likely to be abused and where those who must pay the taxes could most immediately and wisely interpose political check in case of its abuse—political check, that the revolutionary spirit so often invoked in the past might not be invoked again. The House of Representatives are elected every 2 years—the House alone can originate bills for raising revenue. The Congress alone may impose taxes. The principle of government underlying taxation they thoroughly understood. But when you think of the burden of government in these days, the crushing weight of expenditures increasing year by year, one must conclude that the power to impose taxes is even more vital than when the Constitution was framed—it is the power of life and death over the citizen; it is the power to destroy. We are accustomed when speaking of the history of taxes to refer to the kings who have lost their heads or their crowns in attempting to impose taxes without the consent of the people. But I am interested in a more homely and a more common tragedy, that of millions of men, women, and children who daily make sacrifices that they may meet the burdens of government. I want to keep the power to levy taxes close to those who pay the taxes and do the voting.

The fathers provided that the House should originate measures of revenue, and they placed the power there. In the name of God, let us keep it there! It is not the question of an hour. It is not the question of a day. It is a question of years—I trust of centuries—and whether we are going to preserve this Government as it ought to be preserved and make it the obedient instrument of the people.

If Congress instinctively senses its inability to discharge the duties imposed upon it by the Constitution, if the Congress would evade or shirk the trust reposed in it by the people, let it at least summons the courage to propose openly through an amendment to the Constitution these fundamental changes, this redistribution of power. If Congress hungers for political subserviency, if it covets the ignominious role of display without power, of debate without authority, will we not as a parting act of courage and self-respect propose that the fundamental law be changed? Are we not willing to give the people a chance to say whether they wish the taxing power to be reposed in one man? We should not seek through subtlety, through trickery, what we dare not propose openly before those who sent us here. I do not know of a more shameless betrayal of a public trust than that of surrendering the power with which we are temporarily intrusted than of evading the obligation which for a brief season we have been willing to assume.

An ex-President of the United States said a few days ago that the President of the United States enjoys greater power than any living sovereign. Woodrow Wilson once said to me, or said in my presence, that he shuddered when he thought of the power which he possessed as a President. He is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He is in charge of the foreign affairs of our Government. He has practically the war-making power, because he may so conduct foreign affairs that the declaration of war by the Congress is a formality. He has the veto power; the pardoning power. He has the appointing power of all the officers in the Federal Government. The Supreme Court of the United States has now decided that he has the dismissing power. No Senator who has served very long in this body will underestimate the influence of that power. No Senator who has witnessed the subtle influence of the appointing power upon legislation will underestimate that power of the President.

Truly, as has been said, the President enjoys more power than any living sovereign. Shall we delegate now the most exceptional power, the most delicate power, the most precious power of the people also to the President of the United States? Not this President. Let us dismiss that idea. Individuals and persons have nothing to do with this debate. But shall we turn over to the Executive, with all his tremendous powers, the additional power which enables him to levy duties as a practical proposition which the people of the United States are to pay? Mussolini was put to the inconvenience of seizing power, but we as a Congress are going like a bastinadoed elephant, bowing at the feet of the President and surrendering to him the power which the people repose in us.

Something is happening here, my friends, which the fathers of the Constitution never dreamed of. In studying and discussing the question of the division of power—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial—they surveyed the whole field of experience and the entire realm of thought as to what might happen. Hamilton and Madison were deeply interested in the subject. Madison said that the accumulation of all power—legislative, executive, and judicial—in the same hands may be pronounced as the very definition of tyranny. He further said in the same discussion that power is of an encroaching nature and ought to be restrained from passing the limits assigned to it. It was a subject in which they felt profoundly, and they undertook to survey the conditions under which that power might be frittered away from one department to the other. But they never dreamed, nowhere discussed, and nowhere contemplated that the Congress of the United States would voluntarily surrender its power. It never entered their minds that the people would elect a Congress which from time to time and year to year would voluntarily surrender its power—as one Member of the other body said, get rid of the details, get rid of our troubles; leave us a debating society.

My friends, I am not going to discuss today the legal question, although I do want to say a few words in regard to it. The flexible-tariff provision is not a new subject with me. I have been opposing it ever since it has been proposed in the Congress. If I may be permitted to say so, I voted against the last tariff bill because, among other reasons, it was in that bill. I regarded it of such a grave nature that I have not yet felt that I could surrender my views in regard to it. I declared then that the law as passed in 1922 was unconstitutional. I know that the Supreme Court has decided that it is constitutional. I cannot follow their reasoning, though I must bow to the decision. Perhaps it is for us to accept the decree of the Court and go forward. But even if we do that, the question of policy would remain.

The Supreme Court decides these matters under different circumstances than those under which we enact laws. When a congressional enactment goes to the Supreme Court, the Court gives an immediate presumption in favor of the law. It gives every presumption in favor of the power of Congress to enact the law, and it often determines such questions upon that presumption. But I wonder what the members of the Supreme Court would do as Members of this body if each and every one of them were sitting here and called upon to delegate that power where they were free to exercise their judgment relieved from the presumption that Congress acts within its authority and relieved from the presumption that Congress intended to delegate power which it had the power to delegate.

I thought, when I read the President's interview, what would President Hoover do if he were a Senator here from some State sitting upon the question? Does anyone think, judging his history and judging his character by his history, that he would give up any power he possessed if the Senate of the United States attempted to delegate it away?

We are sitting here determining a policy, notwithstanding the decisions of the Supreme Court. Let us review these decisions briefly, because I must not detain the Senate more than a few moments longer.

The case to which we go back and to which all decisions go back when they seek to find authority for this kind of delegation of power is the famous case of the brig Aurora, decided, I think, in 1809. At least, it involves the law known as the "non-intercourse law", enacted under President Jefferson. That law forbade the importation of goods from Great Britain and France.

The law provided, however, that in case either France or Great Britain should revoke their decree, revoke their pronouncement with reference to neutrality, then upon the instance of that revocation the President would so declare and trade be resumed. The law itself provided that upon the promulgation of that fact the law should operate so-and-so, and that the two countries should be permitted to trade.

That is the decision to which we go back when we are seeking for the beginning of authority for this delegation of power. But, Mr. President, that was a complete law in itself. There was nothing for the President to determine except a specific fact, to wit, that either of the governments have revoked their decree. That rule has never been doubted. That is the rule in all the State courts. The test is this: If the facts may be definitely stated and accurately ascertained, then the power may be delegated to do the particular thing based upon those facts.

Then came the case of Field against Clark, so far as this particular question is concerned. The law, enacted under President McKinley, provided that certain products should come into this country free—molasses, hides, and some other things. But the law provided that in case those countries from which those goods were coming should enact a law imposing duties upon our agricultural products, then, upon the ascertainment of that fact and the President of the United States pronouncing it, certain duties provided in the law—not made by the President, not determined by the President, but specifically provided in the law—should go into effect.

That law was complete within itself. The duties were specified. There was nothing left except the fact as to whether or not a duty had been imposed such as the President believed constituted want of reciprocity.

In that case there was a division of the court. Justice Lamar and Chief Justice Fuller dissented, and while, of course, the decision of the Court as a decision established the law of that case, I cannot read the dissenting opinion without coming to the conclusion that the sounder law and certainly the wiser policy were stated by the dissenting justices.

Then, Mr. President, came the case of Hampton against the United States, decided in Two Hundred and Seventy-sixth United States Reports. The Court passed upon the law of 1922 and held that law constitutional. Here we come to the first instance in which the Court jumped clearly from the ascertainment of a fact, where the power was not given to levy duties, over to the proposition of the ascertainment of a fact and the finding and levying of duties, the establishing of duties. The law was incomplete because it was necessary for the President to establish the duties and proclaim them before the law became complete. With all due respect to the Supreme Court of the United States, that decision was a great surprise, I will say, to me. But if it establishes the law in that case it only enjoins upon us more definitely the proposition of guarding our rights here as a law-making body.

The policy is for us to establish. I ask in all sincerity, and I ask my able friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], if that is the law, if the Congress may delegate to the President upon ascertaining the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, the power, according to his judgment, to declare what the duties shall be, and thereby piece out the law to make it complete, where are we going to stop?

If we transfer to the Executive the power we here propose to transfer, when and where shall we halt in our mad and reckless generosity? If we set the pace, what Congress may we hope will have the integrity of purpose, the courage, and the patriotism to stay the craven surrender of power now going on and to put an end to this chronic renunciation of the obligations given to and imposed upon us by the Constitution? Precedents established by timid or indifferent men will be cited by sincere and conscientious legislators upon the assumption that they were honestly established. If we are justified either by the Constitution or expediency in giving the Executive this authority to deal with customs revenue, is there any convincing argument to be adduced against granting equal authority over income taxes and all other taxes? Why should we surrender the powers which so clearly belong to the law-making department? What a shirking, apologetic admission upon the part of Congress that it is unworthy of the trust. What a shameless confession upon our part that representative government is a failure. No more unworthy public servant slimes his way through the corridors of the Government than the public servant who evades or barters away solemnly imposed obligations. There is something to be said for the public servant who weighs well his public duty and fails. There is something to be said for the man who dishonors his place of honor but leaves it all intact for a competent and faithful successor. But there is no plea to be made for the man who goes out and seeks from the people these places of honor and trust, of obligations and power, and then surrenders them over to another. This is an act for which there is no defense to be found.

The argument is made that this transfer of power is born of necessity, that the construction of the Constitution permitting this transfer arises out of the inherent necessity of the situation. This doctrine of necessity has even found its way into the decisions of the courts. Necessity, as has often been said, knows no law, regards no constitution. When I hear men appeal to necessity in justification of their acts, I am bound to conclude that they thus admit they cannot find any justification for their course within the terms of the Constitution. If the Constitution, or any reasonable rule of construction, would authorize this delegation of power, there would be no occasion to invoke the doctrine of necessity. That is an argument that is made solely and alone in the absence of constitutional authority. This word "necessity" has an ancient and unsavory reputation. It is closely associated with arbitrary government. It smacks of personal power. It has always been the plea of the lawless. It has no place in constitutional government. There may be reasonable and just grounds for changing and rewriting the Constitution. If so, let that appeal be made to those alone who are authorized to change it. But so long as the Constitution stands, the plea of necessity can never be heard without disregarding every principle upon which our form of government rests.

Mr. President, there have been two books lately written, which are very interesting books, and I think very great books. One was written by Lloyd Paul Stryker, a lawyer, of New York, which is entitled "The Life of Andrew Johnson." The other was written by that brilliant young writer, Claude G. Bowers, and is entitled "The Tragic Era." Both books cover practically the same period in American history, the most regrettable and unfortunate period in our entire history—that is, the reconstruction period. The Constitution was tested even beyond the test of civil war. Acting under passions born of the recent struggle, guided by a spirit of revenge rather than a spirit of justice, strong men searched the Constitution for power, for authority to do those things which the wise framers of that instrument never intended should be done. The authority could not be found. Baffled and discouraged in their search for authority to justify their acts and deeds and wholly unable to find it, they raised the old cry of necessity. The necessity of the situation. Under this plea they proceeded to put this Constitution to the severest strain yet recorded in our history.

The student of that period rises from his survey of those events with a deep-seated distrust of all constitutional plans and all constitutional arguments which must be supported and propped by the plea of necessity. Once the plea is admitted, where is the limitation of power? Once the plea is accepted, and who will be bound by the authority thus invoked? Once the plea is admitted, and there is no constitution except the will and purpose of those who happen to be in power at that particular period.

But if those acting under the fierce feeling of internecine strife are not to be pardoned—and, in my judgment, they are not—what will be said of those who raise the plea, the fierce, demoralizing plea, in times of peace, in times which admit of reflection and considered judgment? Let us conserve and preserve the principles of the Constitution faithfully and religiously until the people remake that Constitution. There is no excuse to be given for any other course. Such excuses as may be conjured up do credit neither to our integrity of mind nor our sincerity of purpose.

Necessity has no proper place in our vocabulary when we are exercising the constitutional powers of this Government. We must either find the authority in the Constitution or we must halt and go back to the people and ask the people if they themselves want to delegate that power. Upon no other principle can a republican government long endure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Now, Mr. President, to the matter before us.

The essential feature of the provisions under consideration contemplates the transfer of a part of the taxing power, as the present law transfers a part of the taxing power, from the Congress of the United States, the legislative branch, to the President, the executive branch. Whatever technicalities may be appealed to in this connection, there is no doubt at all that the power is thus given to the President of the United States to raise or lower duties on imports, and thus in effect to exercise the taxing power.

It is urged in behalf of this legislation that in the first place the Congress is unequal to the task of determining with that accuracy with which it ought to be determined the question as to what the rates should be upon the basis of the principle proclaimed, the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad; second, that it is unable to grant relief where relief is necessary with the celerity which is requisite to preserve industries that are threatened by foreign competition. These reasons were elaborated in the address with which this discussion was opened by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and were repeated in the interview with the President published in the papers on yesterday. They are, however, epitomized in the report of the committee which accompanies this bill. I read from it:

"In recognition of the obvious inability on the part of Congress to ascertain with exactness all the essential facts relating to the myriad items in a tariff act and to fix effective protective tariff rates to meet constantly changing competitive conditions, Congress in section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922 empowered the President, after investigations by the Tariff Commission, to adjust and readjust the rates fixed by statute (subject to the limitations prescribed), so as to equalize foreign and domestic costs of production."

But, Mr. President, the power of the President in the premises was limited. He is authorized to raise or lower the duties only to the extent of 50 percent of the rates prescribed in the bill.

The first question is, Why should there be any such limitation? If the Congress is unable accurately to fix the rate under existing conditions, or if the necessary celerity in the dispatch of the business cannot be attained through action by Congress but must be reposed in the President, why should his power be limited to 50 percent?

Take the case of pig iron, for instance: This bill, it is said, has been framed upon the basis of equalizing the differences in conditions of competition, and the Senate Finance Committee conceives that in order to do that it is necessary to raise the rate on pig iron just 100 percent. If 100 percent is necessary in order to equalize the differences, why should not the President of the United States be given that power? If it is the purpose to remove injustices and to correct errors in the bill, why allow them in part to remain?

Likewise, Mr. President, if a rate is too high and there no longer remains any difference in the costs of production of that particular article in this country and abroad, why should the President be restrained in his power to reduce the rate to a nullity, or to such a degree as to equalize the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, however low it goes?

Moreover, why should we undertake to fix the rates at all? Why not just declare in the bill what commodities shall go on the dutiable list and what commodities shall go upon the free list, and then provide that the Tariff Commission shall ascertain the difference in the cost of production with respect to these commodities at home and abroad and give the Tariff Commission power to fix the rates?

It is a very simple thing. We could say these things go upon the free list, the other things go upon the dutiable list. Then the Tariff Commission could be authorized and directed to ascertain the difference in the costs of production, and the President would fix the rates accordingly.

If we gave that power to the President, what would be the difference in principle between that and giving him the power to raise or lower the rates 50 percent? No one thinks of granting any such power as that to the President. It would be perfectly obvious, under those circumstances, that we would be granting to him a power which the people reposed in us.

Why was this extra session called at all? If the Congress is unequal to the task of ascertaining with reasonable accuracy what the difference is between the cost of production at home and abroad, or if the necessary celerity of action cannot be secured through Congress, why was this extra session called?

It is said that, in addition to agriculture, some specific industries are in a depressed condition because of competition from abroad. Then why go farther than the agricultural rates and refer to the commission the obligation and the duty to ascertain what is the difference in costs of production in those lines of industry that are supposed to be suffering and delegate the power and move the commission to act in those specific cases? Is not the logic of the situation that the resolution of the Senator should have been adopted and the relatively few suffering industries among so many that are prosperous be relegated to the commission and the President under the flexible provisions of the law?

Mr. President, the rule which ought to govern in this matter is expressed in very persuasive language in a work on Limitation of the Taxing Power, written by Mr. Gray, recognized as a standard by lawyers, in which the author says:

"Legislative power is a trust for the whole people which the legislature cannot transfer. The best safeguard of equality in taxation, as well as in other subjects of governmental action, is in the responsibility of the legislature to the people. So long as the power of taxation is directly exercised by the popular representatives, each section having its representative, the burden is far more likely to be distributed evenly among the people than if the power is exercised by some person or body not directly responsible to the whole people or perhaps not chosen by them.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WALSH of Montana. After that bill was reported containing the provisions to which I have called attention, argument followed upon the floor of the Senate against the constitutionality of that feature of the measure, and eventually the provisions so assailed were eliminated, and those which now appear in the law were substituted in their stead.

Another change was made with respect to language which I shall now read:

"Whenever the President * * * shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the said differences in conditions of competition in trade, he shall, by such investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim" now observe "changes in classification or forms of duty or increases or decreases in any rate of duty."

In the revised Senate committee amendment the words "forms of duties" were eliminated. The argument had evidently alarmed the sponsors for the bill, and an effort was made to free it from its more vulnerable features.

The Smoot amendment and the present law are the same in that respect. They both omit the words "forms of duties" but retain "changes in classification."

"Changes in classification", as I understand, relates to changes from one paragraph to another where a different rate prevails, and "changes in forms of duty" I understand to be a proposal to change ad valorem duties to specific duties, or vice versa.

Mr. President, if we can constitutionally grant this power to the President, why should we not give him the right to transfer specific rates to ad valorem rates in order to equalize the difference in the cost of production? Evidently Senators on the other side, enlightened by whatever discussion took place upon the floor, concluded that they had better not take a chance on giving any such power to the President. So I believe it has been the reasoned conclusion of the Senate of the United States that an act would be unconstitutional framed in the language of the House provision of the bill before us.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us recur, Mr. President, to the reasons that are offered why we should grant this extraordinary power to the executive branch of the Government—that the Congress cannot do the work well; that it is diverted from this duty with so many other important obligations; that it is impossible for the Congress to determine accurately the differences in the cost of production or the differences in the conditions of competition; that many injustices will thus creep into a tariff bill and that it will take a long time to get them corrected; in other words, that the President can do these things very much better than the Congress can.

That is the song that has been sung by despotism throughout all the ages. That is why it is that all power in Italy is vested in Mussolini, because the representatives of the people are inadequate to the task of legislation imposed upon them. That is the reason why the Cortes in Spain has become no longer an active legislative body and all power has been assumed by Primo de Rivera. Pilsudski believes that the Diet of Poland is incapable of discharging the important duties that should devolve upon it, and thus he absorbs all the power of the State. Louis XIV expressed the same view in an epigram.

Let us, as suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] this morning, avoid giving any countenance to doctrines of that kind subversive of every principle upon which our Government is established. The Tariff Commission ought to be continued to discharge the work for which it was created. We should not impose upon it the obligation to levy duties—and that is what this scheme amounts to, because it is perfectly obvious to everybody that the President cannot possibly devote the necessary time to it, that his connection with the thing will be largely nominal. To repose any such power in the President or the Tariff Commission is not only violative of fundamental principles of government but it is contrary to sound business principles.

* * * * * * *

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to submit a few brief remarks against the flexible provisions of the pending tariff bill giving the President, as they do, a power which is lodged in the Congress under the Constitution. It has occurred to me in listening to the various arguments on both sides of the question that if the advocates of the flexible tariff provisions are right in their position their position could very well be enlarged and applied to all the other powers granted by the Constitution. Briefly, I should like to carry out that illustration to see where the Government would come if the policy now before us should be adopted.

Section 8 of article I of the Constitution gives to Congress all of the power that it possesses. It has not one single, solitary power that is not either expressly or impliedly stated in section 8 of article I. The President's powers are also stated in the Constitution, it being the thought of the framers that the Government would be operated in various departments—executive, legislative, and judicial.

The first power given to Congress is the power with which we now have to deal, and I wish to read it from the Constitution:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

The thought is that we will give to the President the right to lay taxes by enabling him, if the bill is passed in its present form, either to increase or decrease the taxes on goods coming into the country. If that is wise, if it is sound, if it is far-seeing, if it is right, let us see how such a policy would apply to some of the other powers granted to the Congress under the Constitution.

The second power given to Congress is "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." Therefore let us set up a board of financiers in the country, let us constitute a financial commission of the big bankers of the United States; and when they see fit to tell the President to borrow money, no law of this body will be required. It is just as sensible to have the financial experts advise the President when money should be borrowed as it is to have the tariff experts advise the President when tariff rates should be raised or lowered.

But let us go a step further. Let us take the next power, which is "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." I will revert to that later. Let us pass on to the raising of an Army. Congress now has the power "to raise and support armies."

Let us set up a board of generals who know what an army should be, who understand what poison gas, machine guns, and tanks are needed, what personnel and what training are required; and instead of Congress fixing the number and the kind of soldiers who shall be in the Army and providing the amount of equipment they shall have and the money to maintain the Army, let us have this military board advise the President and give him the right to raise an army of a million men overnight or decrease it to 5,000 men as he sees fit.

Let us go to the next power, "to provide and maintain a navy." Let us set up a board of admirals. They are experts in that particular field. They know how many guns are needed on battleships, how many destroyers are required, how many submarines are needed, how many airplanes must be in the air, what shells must be made of, the speed of ships, and the personnel that is to be placed upon them. Let us have this board of admirals say whether we shall build cruisers or not build cruisers, and whether we shall build battleships or sink battleships. Why not? It is just as sensible to have the naval experts advise the President and for the President to have the power to act as he sees fit on this subject as it is to have the tariff experts advise the President and have him exercise the power to tax, a power which Congress now exercises when it lays taxes on imports.

What is another of the powers given to Congress? "To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities of the United States and current coin of the United States." There would no longer be need for us to have courts to deal with such matters. There would be no use to have a writ of habeas corpus or a bill of rights. Just give the power to the President, and if someone is guilty of counterfeiting and the President happens to be a despot, he can hang the man if he sees fit without reference to courts. We do not need any laws on the part of Congress. We would have no right to exercise that power.

Does the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] advocate that the President of the United States should have the power at his disposal to decrease and increase the number of battleships and cruisers and the number of sailors and officers in our Navy whenever he sees fit to take action in this matter and without reference to Congress? Of course he does not! Does the Senator from Utah advocate that the President of the United States should have the right either to make a larger army or a smaller one than we now have without reference to the will of Congress? Of course he does not! Why, then, is the Senator from Utah not willing that the power to lay taxes, which the bill will take away from us and give to the President, should not be retained in this body? If all the other examples I have set out are unwise or are wrong, why is this particular example right, the exception to the rule?

Suppose we had a Presidential election and a President and the Members of the House and one-third of the Members of the Senate of one political party should be placed in power. Suppose they would write a new tariff bill just as it has been written here. Suppose the bill should be so iniquitous, so obnoxious, and so ill-advised that the people would rise in their righteous wrath and defeat the Members of the House who helped to frame it at the next election, and that a new House of Representatives would come to take the place of the old one. Could they get rid of the excessive rates if the Tariff Commission and the President had the power to fix them? Of course not, because even though the new House would pass a new tariff bill reducing the rate, it would come over to this body, which could not be removed until 4 years after the act had become a law, and, therefore, the proposed change would die, although the people of the country would be in a revolt against every provision it contained. The answer would be, "We have just had a new tariff act."

Notwithstanding a new House had been elected in protest—a House from the people, a House representing the people of the country more than this body directly represents the people of the country—notwithstanding that fact, we would not act on the Senate side of the Capitol. "There will be no tariff legislation at this session of Congress" would be the slogan. "If you have a case needing change, go down to the Tariff Commission and through the Tariff Commission up to the President and there you will get the relief which you seek. We have surrendered to the President the power which was once in the hands of those directly elected by the people."

Mr. President, if we needed more to show that the purpose back of this measure is simply expediency and not a philosophy of government, not a political belief, not a strong conviction, it is the fact that no other power now granted to the Congress would we dare delegate to the President as it is proposed to delegate power to him under this provision. We surrender the right to collect taxes; we say, in effect, Congress never ought to collect them. The President can change the schedule of tax levies 5 minutes after he has signed his name to the bill if this flexible provision remains in it. We might as well have passed no bill, because the voice of the people is then stilled as far as Congress is concerned. The only man who can reduce or change a schedule is the President of the United States. We may have had good men for President. They may have been well equipped. They may in the past have had fine characters. But we should remember that good fortune does not always bring the best-equipped men to public office. There have been brought to public office in the past men who have lost their heads upon the guillotine, men who have been dragged from the throne of power by an outraged people, men who have been driven into exile shortly after they had been elected. But in this country we say we are always going to have such a President of the United States that the power to tax by him will not be abused.

Let us turn the picture which I have just painted around and look at it from the other side. Suppose the flexible-tariff provision had been in force 2 years previous to 1922 or, to use an ill-advised expression, suppose a "radical" President, one who was not in favor of a tariff, was seated in the White House, would Senators on the other side of the Chamber be in favor of keeping the flexible provision in the tariff law under those conditions? Of course not. No voice louder than that of the Senator from Utah would be raised in this body in favor of repealing the provision. He would say that it would be an abuse of power if it should be exercised by one not in line with the philosophy of this particular bill; but so long as one in line with the philosophy of the bill has the exercise of that power it is right, it is constitutional, and so forth.

I want to say to Senators on the other side of the Chamber who wish to see this bill enacted into law that if this provision shall be retained in it, there will be more than one Senator on the other side who will live to regret it, who will hang his head in shame when he sees the result that will flow from the abuse of this power placed in the hands of a President without the discretion and the balance to use it properly. We have previously had Presidents who thought in terms of liberty, not in terms of money; and they have been among the greatest in this Republic, though they would not be adapted, perhaps to the complex business conditions which now exist throughout the Nation. We may again have a President like that, and, so far as opinion is concerned, he might be on the side opposite to that of those Senators who now favor the measure. Would they want him to exercise the power granted by this flexible tariff provision? I am not arguing the expediency of the matter. I have simply presented the picture to show that the President may not always be relied upon to exercise the power as Senators now contemplate it will be exercised; and if we shall adopt this policy in one case, if it is right in one case, should it not be adopted in all?

There is no analogy between the Tariff Commission and the power proposed to be given to the President on the one hand and the power heretofore given to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the creature and arm of Congress; it belongs to Congress. The President has not a thing to do with it except to appoint its members, by and with the advice and consent of this body. The members of the Tariff Commission, however, under the flexible provisions of the tariff law, are nothing more than Presidential clerks charged with the duty of digging up such information as the President may require. He may, in effect, discharge or promote them or disregard their advice whenever he wishes to do so. We have not given to the President a legislative power in the Interstate Commerce Commission Act, but we propose to give to the President a legislative power in the flexible provision of the pending tariff bill.

Mr. President, the first break in the dam is always a little one, but the flood is frequently a catastrophe. Nations sometimes make their present history by a small event which happened 50 years previously. In 1922 we departed from a distinct philosophy of government. Our country was prosperous; it had obtained peeminence in the world in the field of commerce. There are always persons who want to tinker with the carburetor when the engine is running well. Such men were present in this body and in the other House in 1922. We had exercised the power to enact tariff legislation before 1922 without the flexible-tariff provision, and, so far as I know, it did not result in great danger to the Nation.

The Congress had taken care of tariff matters for more than a century previous to 1922 without any injury to the Republic. We then turned our back on that policy, under which the fixing of tariff duties was a duty devolving absolutely upon us, and not upon the President of the United States.

Let us turn over to another section of the Constitution—for that is what we are really debating—the policy and the power of the Congress. What are the duties of the President? The Constitution provides what shall be the qualifications of the President and then goes on to say that he is to be the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy and Militia, that he may secure the opinion of the officials who serve under him on any subject he may wish, and that he shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, and so on; that he shall have the power to fill vacancies, and shall from time to time give to Congress information on the state of the Union. The Constitution says that the President shall be the executive—not the legislative—head of the Government.

What do the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Bingham], or the other advocates of this measure, care that men marched through the snows of Valley Forge for the right to express their will through their representatives in our Congress? What does the Senator from Utah care that men died through 4 years of civil war to preserve this Constitution written as it was and in all that its spirit and letter imply? This is the break in the dike; we have been tinkering around this very weak spot for a long while, and now we are going to hit it, to open the crack and destroy the legislative branch of our Government. Once open it, and remember you will be eventually on that side where the water escapes down into the valley, where the catastrophe is impending, and to none will it come quicker than to the business interests of the country, once the people find that they cannot through their representatives change the law of the land.

Men have smiled at such remarks as I am making through all the centuries; there have always been men to scoff. There have always been those who could not see that power wisely used today may not be so wisely used tomorrow.

I suggest that instead of writing into the pending bill the flexible tariff provision it would be a good idea to write into it a repeal of the thirteenth amendment, which I should like to read, because it is particularly apropos at this point. The thirteenth amendment as it now stands reads in this fashion:

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

The minute, Mr. President, you take from the people the right of their representatives to levy taxes and put that right in the hands of a man who can practically perpetuate himself in office for 8 years, you repeal the thirteenth amendment in effect, because we are all economic slaves, and the only difference is that we have a little hope in 8 years of removing our bonds, where under most forms of slavery that hope cannot be entertained.

There is an amusing side to this controversy which I think is worthy of mention. I remember in the campaign of 1924, when the then Senator from Wisconsin, the senior La Follette, was a candidate, when Republican orators were going all about the West saying that La Follette was attempting to tear the Constitution from its base; that he was attempting to tear down the institutions of Government because he advocated some amendments to the Constitution. It is surprising that those who applauded on that occasion should sit in the Senate some years afterwards and see the son of that same Senator standing here struggling to maintain the Constitution in all of its letter and spirit and vigor, while those who then opposed his father are trying to tear it down in the most dangerous fashion that has ever been attempted.

Mr. President, if this amendment shall be adopted, if it is right to take away the taxing power from the representatives of the people and give it to the President, then let us give all other powers to the President. Let the Navy be regulated by a commission of admirals; let the President have the power to decrease it or increase it at will; let the Army be regulated by a commission of generals, and give the President authority to enlarge it or decrease it at will. If it is right in one instance, it is right in every instance; and if it is wrong, no argument can make it right. Certainly if those who favor the flexible-tariff provision are not willing to concede that the President be given other similar powers, then their case is none too strong. To give part only of such power is wrong; it may be less wrong, but it is wrong just the same.

The adoption of this amendment will mean that Congress has formally said to the President of the United States, "Henceforth you, not the representatives of the people, shall lay taxes in this country."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I sometimes wonder what we are coming to. I sometimes think we have reached the point where men and women in this country have little respect for anything. One would think that the officials of this Government would concern themselves somewhat about the Constitution under which they are officials; but we find that from the highest to the lowest they pay very little attention to it.

I quote just a word from the Constitution:

"He" meaning the President "shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient."

And yet we find the remarkable spectacle within the last day or two—I believe on Tuesday, to be exact—of the President of the United States making a recommendation about legislation, and paying no more attention to the Congress than if it did not exist. He made no recommendation to the Congress, but he joined in the newspaper debate; and I find another remarkable thing about that communication, Mr. President: Although this communication was made on September 24, 2 days ago, no Republican Senator has even put it in the RECORD. It is not officially before us, and I am going to put it in the RECORD now. Some of our Republican friends, I believe, have repudiated it. At any rate, some of them have denied the propriety of the President's saying anything at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator from Texas will yield to me for about 2 minutes, I should like to point out that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], while not intentionally, of course, has been somewhat unfair in his statement. There are any number of men who believe in the principle of a flexible tariff who do not believe, however, that the power under the flexible provision should be placed in the hands of the President of the United States. To argue for the flexibility of the tariff is one thing; to argue that the President shall exercise the power given under the flexible provision of the law is another thing.

There are many Senators in this body who are not opposed to the pending amendment who would not be opposed to having the flexible provision retained in the law were the power under it to be exercised by some agency of the Congress. What we are contending against, as the Senator from Ohio is contending to the contrary, is that Congress should not give up its power to lay taxes and transfer that power to the President of the United States. Mr. Chester Gray is with those of us who take the view that Congress should retain that power. He is not with the Senator from Ohio, who has just put his letter into the RECORD, because Mr. Gray wants the President eliminated so far as the exercise of that power is concerned.

I can see the logic and the force and the wisdom of having some agency set up between that may take care of injustices and inequalities which may develop in any tariff law, the passage of one bill and the enactment of another, but we can do that without surrendering the legislative power to the Executive of this country. If such a measure shall be offered, drawn along fair and proper lines, I will be inclined to support it, but I am unalterably opposed not to the flexible provision itself so much as I am placing the power to exercise that flexibility in the Executive, who is not the lawmaking branch of the Government and has no more right to lay taxes than has the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who heads the judicial department of the Government. Why not transfer the authority under the flexible provision to the Supreme Court and have judicial determination of questions arising under it, rather than transferring the power to the Executive? It would be just as logical and just as reasonable.

I only rose, I will say to the Senator from Texas, to point out that the Senator from Ohio in his argument has placed those who oppose this amendment in the position of being opposed to the theory underlying the flexible tariff provision, when, as a matter of fact, many are in favor of that theory but opposed to the transfer of legislative authority to the Executive.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Oct. 1, 1929]

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, no; I hope the Senator will not do that.

The way the Senator from Kansas proposes to bring this question fairly before the Congress is, not that it may be fairly and scientifically debated, but to wave the bloody shirt of partisanship; to inject the heat of the last Presidential campaign into it, and to drive a little bit of party heat into this so-called "great, scientific, and intellectual discussion, the tariff question."

The Senator from Kansas also neglected to state that the real issue here is not whether the flexible provision should be or should not be inserted in the law. The real issue is whether Congress or the Executive branch of the Government shall exercise that power. Why did he not debate the pending question?

If the Senator from Kansas is hoping to write a tariff bill on that sort of basis, it will be even worse than that which can be conceived of the President exercising the taxing powers given him in the flexible provisions of the bill now before us.

Mr. TYDINGS subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to announce that under laws passed by the Mexican Congress the President of that Republic has the power to raise and lower and make tariff taxes or duties. I have in my hand a number of translations of decrees issued by the President of Mexico and one by the President of Guatemala. This power has been in the Mexican law at least since 1885. I should like to have these translations printed in the RECORD. I also have prepared an American decree such as might be issued by the President of the United States in line with the decrees issued by the Presidents of Mexico and Guatemala. I should like to have all of these printed in the RECORD.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Sept. 27, 1929]

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of interest to the very learned and earnest Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who concluded his remarks a little while ago.

I heartily agree with the sentiments expressed by the Senator in his closing words, when he made an appeal that Senators in this Chamber should demean themselves as Senators of the whole Union rather than Senators of any particular geographical section. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he carry that idea a little further, and enjoin upon Senators the duty, at least in considering changes in fundamental policies, of acting as Senators for all of the people of the United States rather than to be willing to change a fundamental governmental policy in order that industry may have a quickly efficient and easily handled agency to give it a special and selfish service whereby to raise protective tariff rates whenever it may please, at the expense of all of the people of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senate is soon to vote upon section 336 as embodied in the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] and known as the "flexible-tariff provisions." In 1922 for the first time the Congress adopted the policy of giving the President of the United States the power, first, to change a rate of tariff; second, to change the classification of a commodity; or, if his purpose to fix tariff rates cannot be accomplished in either of those fashions, then to change the basis of valuation from the foreign valuation to the domestic valuation or the American selling price.

For myself, Mr. President, my conviction is that that power, surrendered in 1922, ought to be recaptured by Congress and redeposited where it belongs, in the legislative department of the Government.

But it is said that the Supreme Court, in the case of Hampton v. The United States (276 U.S. 394), has held it to be constitutional to give this power to the President as it was given in section 315 of the act of 1922. But, Mr. President, that decision is not binding on the Congress of the United States. Congress may, and should, repeal the law which it construed. It is not binding upon our policy or our course of future action. But let us just for a moment examine the reasons which actuated the Court in Hampton against The United States in upholding section 315.

The Court's action was based upon the theory—and it was only a theory—that under that section Congress had authorized the President merely to find particular facts, and, upon the finding of those facts, then to put into operation tariff rates already fixed by the Congress. But, Mr. President, section 336 as now proposed goes far beyond section 315 of the existing law. The amendment of the Senator from Utah proposes, first, to give the President the power that he now has under section 315, and then there is to be superadded a further power. Let me read it just for a moment.

It is provided that in exercising the power of fixing a new tariff rate or the power of transferring a commodity from one classification to another or of transferring from the foreign valuation to the American selling price, the President shall bear in mind the following things with this qualification:

"The President, insofar as he finds it practicable, shall take into consideration," and so forth.

Mr. President, in that language, "insofar as he finds it practicable", is introduced much more than authority to find facts. Therein is vested the widest exercise of judgment or discretion on the part of the President of the United States. Is it the finding of a fact to determine whether or not a certain element is practicable of application? Does not that involve the exercise of judgment on the part of the President—discretion, if you please—the exercise of will and of choice?

The President may consider these elements or factors, or he may reject them. But the crowning authority that the Senator from Utah seeks to give to the President under this clause is contained in subsections (3) and (4).

The President may or may not consider "(3) Advantages granted to a foreign producer by a foreign government, or by a person, partnership, corporation, or association in a foreign country; and (4) transportation costs and any other advantages or disadvantages in competition."

By the employment of that language, "any other advantages or disadvantages in competition", this bill, if adopted by the Senate and by the House, will give to the President the option of considering any factor or any element which might appeal to his judgment or to his discretion. After the enumeration of certain factors which he must consider only if he finds them practicable, then the blanket authority is granted the President to consider any other advantages or disadvantages. The determination as to whether the thing is an advantage or not is the exercise of judgment and discretion.

The question, then, as to what particular advantages or disadvantages the President may select, necessarily, involves judgment and action upon the part of the President.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it cannot be reasonably contended here that the power that is granted to the President by this section is merely the power of finding facts. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the Hampton case, assumed that Congress was speaking the truth when it said that the President was to find facts and facts only.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wanted to inquire of the Senator whether the Supreme Court in its opinion canvassed these elements of discretion and judgment to which our attention has been called?

Mr. CONNALLY. From my reading of the opinion, I did not so understand it. It simply used the term "the differences in costs of production."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In other words, these matters involving judgment and discretion on the part of the President of the United States in arriving at a conclusion were not canvassed at all in the opinion?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is as I read the decision. But let me say, Mr. President, that the Supreme Court of the United States in its endeavor to uphold a statute of Congress always indulges every presumption that what Congress has done is supported by the Constitution, if possible. It always presumes that any declaration of fact made by Congress is in truth a declaration of fact. Because of its respect for the Congress, a coordinate department of Government, it indulgences every reasonable presumption that what it intends is legal and that its declarations speak the truth.

In the decision in the case of Hampton against The United States the Court simply found that, by the standard of measurement "differences in cost of production", the President could ascertain those particular facts, because Congress had said that all that the President should do was to find facts.

Mr. President, it is the duty of Congress, in exercising its authority, to look at the substance and not at the form, and all of us here know that what the President is to do, in fact, is not simply to find facts but that the President is to change a law enacted by the Congress. But it is said that he has only the power to change it within certain limitations. Regardless of what the extent of the change may be, the very power which the Senator from Utah seeks to grant to the President is the power to change a tariff rate, a power which, prior to 1922, was never undertaken to be exercised anywhere except in the legislative branch of this Government.

Action by the President is to be substituted for the action of Congress. Such is openly avowed.

Whatever the President may do, whether we call it the finding of a fact, or the changing of a rate, or a valuation, or a classification, whatever the President may do is to be employed as a substitute for the action of the Congress. What is the action of the Congress? The action of the Congress is the laying of a duty. The action of Congress is the fixing of a rate; and if, by any device or any particular contrivance, the same effect is to be accomplished in some other way, the result being the same, the two things are the same. When, by this particular device, the committee proposes to substitute for the action of the Congress the action of the President, they are seeking to empower the President to lay a duty.

Let us for a moment, without, I hope, painful reiteration of what has already been much better said than I can possibly express it, examine what are our constitutional warrants for doing anything with relation to taxation or the levy of tariff rates.

As I recall it, section 1 of article I of the Constitution provides that all legislative power shall be vested in the Congress of the United States. The power to make laws, the power to make those rules of action which shall govern and bind the people of the United States—all legislative action, not some, not particular kinds, but all, without any restriction and without any boundary whatever to its domain—is vested in the Congress. All legislative power includes the power of making and laying duties and taxes.

What are the other constitutional provisions? Another provision is that the Congress shall have power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." To do what? To lay and collect duties. Within those words and within the language "all legislative power is vested in the Congress" are the only grants anywhere in the Constitution under which we can assume to act. All of the power the Constitution granted anywhere to do either of those things was granted to the Congress and to the Congress alone.

Mr. President, it is said that the President of the United States is merely to find the facts. It is claimed that after he has found the facts, he is to take the law made by Congress and apply those facts to the law. I submit that in the case of Field against Clark, which is the case upon which the opinion in the case of Hampton against United States is based, that was more nearly a correct statement. In the Tariff Act of 1890, the provisions of which were construed in Field against Clark, the Congress of the United States clearly and definitely provided for the free entry of certain articles of commerce and commodities. It then, in another clause, provided that whenever any country should discriminate against the agricultural products of the United States, and the President should ascertain that fact, then rates of duty should apply to articles specifically mentioned and set out in particularity—to molasses and certain other products from the discriminating country. So in the case of Field against Clark it was held that it was the duty of the President simply to find a fact, the fact of discrimination by a foreign country; and finding that fact, to put into effect rates of duty already specifically defined and prescribed by the Congress in the act itself.

Let us see if that is the case before the Senate today. I submit that the very reverse is the case under section 336. What is the President to do? Is he simply to find facts? He may find facts, if you can term as fact finding the exercise of choice and judgment and discretion as to the variety, yea, the multitude, of factors which he may consider. But what is he to do after he finds these so-called "facts"? The President, after he finds the facts, is not to take those facts and fit them into existing rates of duty already proclaimed by the Congress. The President is to make new rates. In other words, instead of fitting the facts to the law, the President is to fit the law to the facts. It is a reversal of the theory upon which the case of Field against Clark was based by the Supreme Court.

Let me repeat, under section 336 of the present act of the President of the United States, if he is able to find the facts, then cuts the law to fit the facts, whereas the theory, in order to avoid constitutional objections, is that the Congress makes the law—inexorable, unchanging, unyielding—but the President, when he finds the facts, simply fits the facts to the law. The pending bill reverses that policy.

Of course, all of us know that when we strip this section 336 of all its adornments, of all of its masks, and of all of its attractive raiment, the purpose of it is not to authorize the President to find facts but to make new tariff rates.

In theory, in order to avoid the constitutional inhibition that the President cannot make tariff rates, the President is simply to be an adding machine; the President is simply, by pushing the buttons on the adding machine, to determine the various calculations or factors entering into the fact findings. The President is to be merely a robot, as it were, a mechanical man, using only those particular faculties of his mind that deal with mathematical facts, adding and subtracting and dividing, by that process arriving at the differences in costs of production, transportation, and all of the other factors and elements.

In order to avoid the constitutional objection the President is simply to be a mechanical contrivance, registering accurately and without any deviation from the rule of precision certain mathematical calculations. He is, as it were, to be a sort of animated barometer, registering scientifically and specifically every change anywhere in the world in industry, and as he registers those changes, up the tariff rate goes or down it may decline.

The President is to be a sort of a seismograph, but a seismograph with a brain, registering every little shock, every seismic disturbance anywhere in the commercial or manufacturing world.

That is the fiction, that is the theory, that is the process by which the proponents of the flexible provision seek to avoid the constitutional impediments in the way of the President making tariff rates.

What is the President in fact? The President, who shall receive and exercise the power of making rates or changing valuations, will not be a mere mechanical device; he will still be a man, with blood in his veins and a brain in his head. He will be a man, I dare say, with some human frailties. Perhaps he will be a human being with the impulses of gratitude. He will be more than President; he will be still the leader of a great political party, and a candidate for its continued favor. He will have all the human passions and the human ambitions and the human weaknesses that other men possess, and to say that to give the President the power proposed is to grant the power only to ascertain mathematical results is to fly in the face of what we all know to be the truth.

Mr. President, the effect of the amendment, if adopted, will be to give the President full and complete power. There is no veto on the President's power. If the Congress makes a tariff rate and the President in his judgment may not agree to it, the Constitution wisely provides a check upon that act in his veto. But if the President under this particular provision of the bill enacts a new tariff rate, it is not repealable save by the action of the Congress, and by the same power of veto which he could use on other legislation he could defeat the action of the Congress and continue to make the tariff.

How has the Tariff Commission worked out during the 7 years of its existence? I shall not trespass upon your patience, Mr. President, by repeating all of the statements that have been so ably made here by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and other Senators detailing the history of the Tariff Commission during the past 7 years. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] on yesterday in an instructive and entertaining address laid before the Senate the history of the Tariff Commission and the results of its labors. Without going into the particular details, what, in short, has been the history of the Commission?

The history of the Commission discloses that frequently the Commission has divided 3 and 3; 3 Democrats and 3 Republicans. And yet the President, though he be the head of a great political party, at the same time would be supposed to decide these questions without any partisanship, without any economic bias, without any ingrained political or economic belief. Under the section we are discussing the President of the United States may adopt the finding of the Tariff Commission or he may reject it. In the past President Coolidge adopted some of the findings of the Tariff Commission and disapproved other findings. There is no compulsion upon the President; and yet Senators would have us believe that this process is to be merely automatic, merely a mathematical determination; but when it is all over, when all the investigation is completed, the President may or he may not put into effect the rates so found.

Has the Tariff Commission been free of politics? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] made an eloquent appeal for taking the tariff out of politics. Does anyone believe that any serious effort will be made in the future to take the tariff out of politics when it reaches the Tariff Commission? The Republican leader, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. Watson], a few days ago said that the tariff always had been a political question, and that he never tried to take politics out of the tariff and did not intend to do so. But before the Tariff Commission, have we not had politics? Before the Commission, have we not had lobbying? It has been disclosed in the debate that in hearings before the Tariff Commission swarms of lobbyists, Congressmen, Senators, and others were there using their influence and pulling every string that might operate to influence the Commission.

Mr. President, it has been disclosed that at least one member of the Commission personally interested in schedules has participated in the action of the Commission. It has been well pointed out that a court which had upon it a member interested in a case before it, if it continued to condone that action, would be a proper subject of impeachment at the bar of the Senate.

The Tariff Commission, however, wants more power. With 7 years of operation under the flexible-tariff clause it wants increased power. The only reason why the Senate is not to vote today upon that clause in the bill placed there by the House is because the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] and others do not believe they can command enough votes to adopt the provision that the President shall have the power to pass upon conditions of competition instead of differences in cost of production. I observe the Senator from Utah smiles when I intimate that the reason for his lack of action is that he does not think he has the votes.

Mr. President, Senators on the Republican side of the Chamber, particularly the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], have devotedly labored to demonstrate that section 336 as offered by the Senator from Utah is constitutional. Suppose it is constitutional. My objection to it is not based upon the fact that it may or may not be constitutional. If unconstitutional, the Supreme Court of the United States, perhaps, would relieve us of that particular provision. But my objection to the provision is that though it be constitutional I am opposed to the policy that section 336 proposes and would resist the effort of the Senate to adopt such a policy regardless of the decision of the Supreme Court.

When the makers of the Constitution assembled in convention in Philadelphia, I dare say that assemblage was as wise, perhaps, even as the Senate, and it proceeded upon the policy that in dividing the Government into three branches there ought to be established a certain system of checks and balances. In other words, it thought that the President ought to execute the laws, but that he ought not to have the power to make the laws. It thought that the President ought to be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but it also said to him at the same time, "You cannot have a dollar to pay for the Army or the Navy until the representatives of the people, the Congress, grant you the money and the supplies." It thought that the President ought to have the power of the appointment of officers, but that there ought to be a check upon that authority and that their names must be submitted to the Senate for confirmation. It provided that the courts might construe the law and interpret the law, but that the courts have no right to make the law.

So, Mr. President, irrespective of the constitutionality of the particular provision to turn over to the President of the United States the power to make tariff rates, the result would be to disturb that system of checks and balances. It would throw out of balance the whole theory of parliamentary government under our system.

It was said wisely by members of the Constitutional Convention that the union of the power to make the laws and the power to execute the laws was the very essence of tyranny. That was a compelling motive in the distribution of the powers among the several departments of the Government. But, let me suggest that the power of taxation and the power of appropriating money are peculiarly the two functions which from time immemorial have been reserved to the representatives of the people. In the long struggle in England for parliamentary government, a struggle extending over 600 years, a struggle waged in the forum and in the field, the triumphs of the people were often brought about by their ability to exact from the King, through control of taxes and appropriations, rights which they could not otherwise exact. These things lie at the very root of representative government under our system—the right of the people's representatives and of no other branch of the Government to levy taxes and to make grants of money.

Mr. President, why delegate this authority to the President? Even if we have the power to do it, why should we do it? It has been suggested by Senators that the President can act more quickly, that the President can fix a rate more efficiently. It would seem that this is to be a theoretical and mechanical device, quickly registering the currents and the tides and the recession of the tides in trade and commerce; that it will infallibly register with a few dots and dashes such a result as to absolutely accommodate the tariff law to conditions throughout the world. Could the President do it more efficiently and more effectively?

It has been pointed out in the course of the debate that the Tariff Commission has not only been inefficient in making its reports but that it has caused interminable delay in finding the purported facts and in the making of its investigation.

It has been said that the power of handling tariff legislation would interfere with other business of the Congress. Why was the Congress created, unless it is to legislate upon the concerns of the people of the United States? Are we merely to draw our salaries? Are we merely to be functionaries of dignity—to officiate at ceremonies? The business of the Congress of the United States is to legislate upon the vital concerns of the people of the United States. If one of those concerns be the tariff, it is the duty of the Congress to consider the tariff, and not seek to escape its responsibility, not seek to evade its duty by handing over to the Executive the power of making tariff duties.

Mr. President, let me say that the plea of efficiency and the plea of speedy action are arguments which have been made in behalf of every despotism that ever cursed the earth. "Let the President or the King do it. He can do it more efficiently and more quickly." A benevolent despotism is the most efficient government on earth. If it would function according to the principles of benevolence continuously, it might be a great blessing; but the trouble about benevolent despotism is that the benevolence dies, while the despotism survives.

Why should not the power be delegated? What are the objections to delegating the power? One objection is that the Congress of the United States, under its authority granted by the Constitution, has the right to legislate upon all matters affecting the welfare of the people according to its own will, not according to some mathematical formula, not according to some mental straitjacket, not according to some particular line of treatment, but the Congress is privileged to exercise its choice and its will in selecting the instruments by which it believes the welfare of the people of the United States may best be served. When the Congress surrenders to the President the power to change tariff rates, it is surrendering to the President its right to exercise its will and choice; it is surrendering to the President its right to deliberate; it is surrendering to the President the right to have the questions involved discussed in the open.

Mr. President, the American people expect the Congress of the United States, in the transaction of the public business, to transact it where people may see what is transpiring, to transact it in a forum where the people may hear the arguments and the debates with relation to these great questions. Then shall we delegate to the Tariff Commission, sitting in a secret chamber, the most solemn functions of legislation which ought to be discharged here in the white light of publicity, in the crucible of public debate, and decided according to what we deem to be the welfare and the interest of the people of the United States and not what some functionary of the Tariff Commission may consider to be the welfare of the people of the United States?

Congress, if it sees fit, has the right to act arbitrarily upon legislation; that is a valuable prerogative for the people's representatives to possess; and I denounce the suggestion that the Congress of the United States should become merely a fact-finding, mechanical device to change tariff rates and policy according to some mathematical formula laid down in advance.

Mr. President, I assert that under the flexible provision the President of the United States, if he might so desire, could defy the will of the people and could defy the will of the Congress. Under the Constitution the House of Representatives, and consequently a new Congress, is elected each 2 years, and one-third of the Members of this body is elected each 2 years. Why was that provision inserted in the Constitution? There must have been a reason; there was a reason. That reason was that the makers of the Constitution intended that there should be frequent recourse to the people at the ballot box in order that they might express their views upon public questions. The President of the United States, however, on the other hand, is elected for 4 years. Suppose a new Congress coming into power should want to increase the rates or to decrease the rates, as the case may be; the President by his veto could defeat any such action, because it is not likely that there would be a two-thirds majority against him; yet, after defeating by veto the will of the Congress, the President could pursue the contrary course. He could continue either to raise the tariff duties or to lower the tariff duties as he might see fit, in absolute defiance of the will of Congress and of the decision of the people at the ballot box in the preceding election. Would that be consistent with our theory of representative government, and would it be consistent with the theory that runs all through the Constitution of our country?

Mr. President, it is said that the flexible provision of the tariff law has been decided to be constitutional. Suppose that has been so decided. I dare say that under the Constitution the Senate of the United States might approve every treaty which the President might negotiate; but because that could be constitutionally done, is there any Senator within these four walls who would say that he would agree in advance to vote for the ratification of each treaty which the President might negotiate without examining into its terms and provisions? Yet the President could dispose of the treaty much more quickly without waiting for senatorial approval. The President could, with greater exactitude and promptness and facility and ease, negotiate a treaty if he did not have to come back to the Senate to secure its approval. Under the Constitution, if we so desired, the Senate may approve by confirmation each appointment the President may make; but is there any Senator here who would say that the Senate ought to forego its power and its duty of passing upon the merits of all of the nominees whose names are submitted here?

As has been wisely suggested by the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], if it be sound policy to give the President the power to fix tariff rates, why would it not be wise to allow the President to determine the size of the United States Army? The President is in contact with foreign affairs; he might investigate and ascertain according to his view the necessity for a standing army and its size. Why not give the President the power to find the facts, let him determine by investigation as to the state of our foreign relations, and then, in accordance with those findings determine the size of the standing army? The same thing may be said as to the United States Navy. I am sure, however, that no Senator would advocate such a policy; I am sure that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, would not believe that the President ought to have such authority as to the Army.

If it be wise to give the President the power to fix tariff rates, why not authorize the President to fix income-tax rates? Let him ascertain through the Budget, as he does now, the financial needs of the various departments; let him find the fact as to how much money may be needed, and then, after finding the fact, graduate the rates in such fashion as to produce the amount of money needed by the Budget.

Why go through the toil and the drudgery of hearings on appropriation bills? It would be much more easy, much more convenient, much more efficient to allow the Executive to determine what appropriations were needed for the support of the various departments of the Government, and let him make them. Ah, Mr. President, I do not believe that Senators here would agree to such a course.

The President of the United States already possesses, as has been pointed out, tremendous power. He has the appointment of five or six hundred thousand civilian employees of the Government. Did you ever stop to consider, Mr. President, that out of the great host of functionaries and officials scattered throughout the Federal Union only 533 officers of the United States are elected by the people themselves? The 435 Members of the House of Representatives, the 96 Senators, the Vice President, and the President of the United States—533 officers—are the only ones that must submit their fortunes at the ballot box and receive the approval or the condemnation of the people. Yet, as to taxation through the tariff, it is proposed to transfer and subtract from the power left in the Congress of 531 Members and place that power in the hands of the President of the United States, who has under him the vast army of officials who are not elected by the people.

Mr. President, a couple of days ago the President of the United States sent to the Senate a message asking that the power delegated under the flexible tariff provision be continued. I said "he sent to the Senate a message." That was an inaccurate statement. He sent a message through the press to the people of the United States for its effect upon the Senate of the United States. It may not be improper here to suggest that whenever the executive branch, or any other branch of the Government for that matter, acquires a certain degree of increased power it always is reluctant to surrender it. So the President of the United States gave to the country a statement with reference to the flexible tariff. Of course, the President would not have given utterance to that public statement if he did not have fear as to the fate of the flexible-tariff provision in the Senate. Of course, the President's statement was given to the press in order to create a sentiment throughout the country which he hoped would react upon the Senate and aid in the adoption of the amendment in relation to the flexible-tariff provision.

We recall, Mr. President, when there was pending before the Senate the so-called "debenture amendment" to the farm-relief act. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] this morning defended the action of the President in issuing a statement regarding the debenture plan while it was pending before the Senate by stating that the President had first been visited by a committee of the Senate, and it would have been impolite and inconsiderate for the President not to have expressed himself. Let it be remembered, Mr. President, that when the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate went before the President of the United States and sought his views and his position on the debenture proposal, the President at that time had no views which he desired to communicate, and refused to express any opinion upon that particular amendment; but at a later stage, when the debenture had acquired strength in this body and it appeared as though it might be adopted, there went out a distress signal, an emergency call, and the President issued a stinging repudiation of the debenture measure.

Of course, it was not improper for the President to give out the statement. I do not criticize the President for doing that. The Constitution authorizes and directs the President to advise the Congress as to measures of government. It is true that that provision of the Constitution intended that the President should file such communications as he might care to make with the Congress in the form of a message rather than with the public press.

The President says, in his statement to the press, that in his message in April he gave his reasons as to broad principles important in tariff legislation and that he advocated the flexible tariff when enacted in 1922. I quote his language:

"I advocated it at that time and since as a necessity in protection of public interest."

Mr. President, the language of the President is strong. He says that the flexible tariff is "a necessity in protection of public interest." I wonder how the President can give the sanction of his great office and the prestige of his high station to a statement of that kind, in view of the rather sorry and miserable record which the Tariff Commission has made in the administration of the flexible tariff within the past 7 years? Viewing that record, the President now tells the country and the Congress that the continuance of the Tariff Commission is a necessity in the public interest!

Of course, the action of the Commission in the future will be the action of the President. President Hoover, in his message in April, desired that the Commission be reorganized. With the power of appointment in the hands of the President, with his power to remove them, with every member fearful of removal, with every member actuated by fear on the one hand and by hope of reward on the other, of course the action of the Commission will be the action of the President of the United States in substance and in fact.

But the President further said:

"No tariff bill ever enacted has been or ever will be perfect."

I heartily agree with the President; but I think it might very well be added that no President has been or ever will be perfect. If the Congress of the United States cannot be trusted to pass a tariff bill which is perfect, and if this bill shall not be perfect, the implication is that the President, through the power to be given to him in this particular section, will be enabled to correct its imperfections.

If that be the view of the Executive, I wonder why this session of Congress? Why bother with the tariff? The President was in possession of the Tariff Commission—a willing, a pliant, a subservient instrument. He could have revised the rates on the limited number of commodities on which he thought they ought to be revised. Why did he not revise those rates under the flexible tariff, without having the Congress spend the summer and fall in the consideration of the tariff question?

Mr. President, the Executive also says:

"Any person experienced in tariff legislation in the last half century knows perfectly well that Congress cannot reopen single items of the tariff without importing discussions all along the line, without the constant unsettlement of business and the importation of contentions and factious questions to the destruction of other important duties by Congress."

The President of the United States uses rather censorious language toward the Congress. In other words, he advises the public that the Congress of the United States cannot adequately and properly discharge its duty of fixing tariff rates because the Congress, in its inefficient and inept processes, cannot do so without interfering with other important business.

What more important business has Congress to perform than to exercise the taxing powers of this Government that shall affect the welfare and the weal and perhaps the prosperity of 120,000,000 people? The President would be glad to have Congress hand over to him that power, and have the Congress busy itself with matters of another nature—the fixing of the salaries of clerks, and the decision as to how many policemen we shall have on Capitol Hill, and how many streets shall be widened in the District. Mr. President, the levy of taxes is of paramount importance. The power of taxation and the grant of appropriations are among the proudest prerogatives of Congress. What is of greater importance?

Let me suggest, Mr. President, that under the Constitution of the United States the President has a great many legitimate duties. One of his chief functions is the enforcement of the law. It is his duty under the Constitution to carry on the executive and the administrative functions of the Government. I dare say if the Executive executes all of the functions that the Constitution devolves upon him, all the legitimate functions already devolved upon him, he will have sufficient to command all of the time and all of the labor which the country ought to demand of any Executive.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], echoing the sentiments of the President's statement, said that he, too, agreed that "the flexible provision is one of the most progressive steps taken in tariff making in all our history."

The Senator from Ohio usually is in agreement with the sentiments of the White House, if he knows them. Progressive, yes—"one of the most progressive steps taken in tariff making in all our history." Progressive—toward what? Is it progressive toward the people's representatives having a voice in the Government or is it progressive toward reaction? Is it progressive toward the centralization of power in the President?

Mr. President, it is progression, but it is progression backward; not toward liberal theories; not toward democratic beliefs in the distribution of the powers of government and in the discharge of the functions of legislation by the representatives of the people.

Mr. President, a moment ago I made the statement that a Tariff Commission removable at will by the President would simpy be a pliant and subservient instrument. Senators will recall, I am sure, the fact that President Coolidge some years ago approached Mr. David J. Lewis, a Democratic member of the Tariff Commission, and assured him that he would be reappointed provided he would deliver into the hands of the President his resignation in advance, subject to acceptance at the President's will. Let it be said that Commissioner Lewis spurned and scorned such a humiliating condition. But if that be the spirit of the Executive with reference to members of the Tariff Commission, with the ax constantly hanging over their heads, the threat of removal by Presidential edict always present, the Tariff Commission can be nothing more than the instrument of the President's will; and will the President be importuned by lobbyists? Will not the President be surrounded with influences? Should we impose further duties upon the President? Already burdened with duties so onerous and multitudinous, is it wise or just to impose upon the President new and vexatious duties?

Mr. President, throughout history the accumulation of power in the hands of a monarch or a despot has usually been the result of a long course or process of acquiring, inch by inch, more and more authority. The President, in his statement to the country a few days ago, said that there was no despotic power involved in the grant to him of the right to regulate the tariff. Yet, Mr. President, throughout the years in the United States the Executive has been growing stronger and yet stronger at the expense of other branches of the Government. I have listened to Senators and Members of the House of Representatives declaim upon the floors of their respective Houses against the centralization of more power in the hands of the Executive; yet I have later listened to the same men speak in advocacy of the delegation of power to the President of the United States.

As was so well observed on yesterday, the President of the United States is already the possessor of greater power than any king or potentate of this earth.

Mr. President, power fattens upon each new morsel. Its appetite increases. With each accession of new power it demands more, just as the Senator from Utah here today is demanding an increase of the power of this Commission over the power that was conferred in 1922 in the flexible clause of section 315. The accumulation of power and the resulting creation of despotism runs through the history of the past.

Augustus Caesar was emperor long before he wore the crown. He accumulated in his hands the powers of the judges, the powers of administrators, and then the power to make the law. After there had been gathered into his hands all of the powers of the Roman state, the throne and the imperial title were assumed.

The First Consul of the French gradually absorbed the powers of government, gradually accumulated in his hands the powers which had been wrested from the Kings of France by the French people; after he had accumulated these vast powers, Bonaparte, with but a single step, ascended a throne.

Mr. President, it is the exercise of power that makes a king. What is a king? Sovereignty does not reside in the insignia and emblems which monarchs were wont to wear.

What is a throne? Napoleon said that a throne was but a bit of gilded wood. Mr. President, a throne is but a gaudy and glamorous seat designed to convey the pretense of eminence. Royal robes do not make a king. A scepter is but a jeweled bauble; a crown nothing more than an ornamented toy. These are but the vain and cheap and tawdry trappings that were a part of the pomp and pageantry of power.

Kingship is the authority to rule. One may wear a sack suit and a straw hat, and yet be more a monarch than one with royal blood in his veins and purple robes about his body.

Mr. President, the President of the United States today is the greatest ruler on the globe. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and of the Navy. He appoints five or six hundred thousand Federal civilian officials, who go scurrying about all over the Union, men who are appointed by his will, and are removable at his will. He carries on the foreign relations of the United States. He makes treaties which carry with them the fate and the fortunes of a people, perhaps war, perhaps peace.

Mr. President, he appoints the judges who shall construe the law which shall bind 120,000,000 of people. He has the veto over the powers of the Congress, though the people's representatives are assembled here.

The President of the United States is greater than any monarch on this earth. Let us look about us, and what do we see?

The King of Spain is but a shadowy phantom of the power that once ruled in his ancient dominions.

The Presidency of France is but an office of ceremony and of dignity.

The King of Italy is but an almost inaudible echo of the royal power that once walked the streets of Rome.

The President of Germany possesses not a tithe of the power of the Hohenzollerns.

The King of England, with all of his castles, with all of his titles, with all of the stately pomp and ceremony with which he is surrounded, is little more than a painted king upon a painted throne. He is merely the husk, the shell, the gilded crust of power which the English people have long since taken over for themselves.

Mr. President, the President of the United States is greater than all of these; but, great as are his powers under the Constitution, there was reserved from his authority the field of taxation. The Constitution of the United States never intended that the President of the United States should levy taxes upon the people. Taxes and appropriations were sacred ground. They were reserved to the Congress—the Senate and the House. This ground was sacred to their servants. The Constitution 140 years ago denied the right of the President to levy taxes, and I shall not vote to give him that power now.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Sept. 27, 1929]

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose today to discuss the rate provisions of the pending tariff bill but rather to confine myself to submitting some observations in respect to the so-called "flexible features" of the measure. I am entirely conscious of the fact that much has been said upon that subject, and that anything which may be declared on the floor now necessarily will be to some extent in the nature of repetition or overlapping. Likewise, I am entirely sensible of the indifference that usually attends upon a discussion of the fundamental doctrine of our three coordinate branches of government and the reluctance with which any one of them should transgress upon the prerogatives of the other two or either of them. Even so, Mr. President, I conceive that principle to be of sufficient importance that it may well bear frequent discussion here and elsewhere.

Although the tariff resting upon the doctrine of protection had existed for almost 70 years prior to 1922, anything like the flexible provision that found its way into the act of that year had theretofore never been advocated with any substantial force from any quarter in the country. The provision was proposed and adopted in 1922 because we were then confronted with unusual and exceptional conditions growing out of the World War. The economic world was abnormal; Europe was torn asunder during the war; the wounds had not been healed. We were dealing with an uncertain future, and the rates were placed unusually high, with a view of constituting almost an embargo against the importation of European-made products.

So, Mr. President, realizing that fact, and anticipating that, in all probability, as economic conditions readjusted themselves the trend of the tariff should be downward, the flexible provision was inserted in that act in order that it might be employed in effectuating that downward trend. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] so stated on yesterday upon the floor of this Chamber. He quoted the chairman of the committee, now in charge of the pending bill, in the presence of the chairman, who quietly acquiesced in the declaration so made. That, Mr. President, was the moving cause which prompted the original suggestion that resulted in the flexible tariff provision being incorporated in the act at that time.

I have already said it was never contained in any previous act. It was advanced, adopted, and enacted into law in order to cope with conditions of an uncertain nature occasioned by the then recent war. It was then advocated because it was anticipated that a downward trend of the tariff would be in order; it was advocated here upon that theory. It was adopted here pursuant to that advocacy. No man will be heard to controvert the statement that the economic world was in an abnormal condition at that time, nor that such fact did not enter as a factor in the enactment of that act. No one will contend here that those who participated in the passage of that bill could foresee with the usual degree of accuracy what the future would bring about in the readjustment of economic conditions following the war; and so the flexible provision was inserted in the tariff bill, giving to the President the power, pursuant to an examination and report of the Tariff Commission, to deal with the subject of duties by raising or lowering them within the 50-percent limit, or changing classifications as the act provided.

It was said 2 or 3 days ago by the chairman of the committee having charge of the bill that we could only judge the future by the past; that this was one of the outstanding achievements of the Republican Party in dealing with the subject of the tariff. He declared that to abandon the theory would be a retrogression in the field of tariff legislation.

I want to quote his words, Mr. President, in order that we may get the present viewpoint of the Senator from Utah, who advocated this provision in its inception 7 years ago upon the theory that the trend would be toward scaling down the rates instead of raising them. In laying before the Senate the present proposal of the committee to continue the substance of the act of 1922, he stated that we must have a modern system that operates expeditiously, and meets, with promptness, changing conditions in the economic world. He used this language, Mr. President:

"In at least one important respect, however, we have made a distinct advance in tariff making. The Tariff Act of 1922 recognized the desirability and importance of a flexible tariff system. That act departed from the inelastic, unnecessarily rigid, principal of all prior tariff laws. It permitted changes in the tariff rates prescribed by the Congress to meet changes in economic and industrial conditions. It was distinctly a sound, progressive contribution by the Republican Party."

Later in his address, in submitting this phase of the bill, he said that promptness and expedition was the end sought to be attained through the operation of the flexible provision.

Mr. President, we have had that provision now for 7 years. The Tariff Commission has been vested with that power during that period of time. It has ordered some 83 investigations. It has made fifty-odd reports to the President. The President has effectuated 31 increases and 5 decreases in the schedules fixed by the act of 1922. These are the facts in face of the statement of the present chairman of the committee that the object sought was a general downward trend of tariff duties.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, at the time of the interruption, which I welcomed, I had adverted to the statement of the Senator from Utah, Chairman of the Finance Committee, urging that the provision be retained in the law and obviously apologizing in advance for the snail's pace at which the Commission had proceeded when he said that during the early part of that period the Commission was reorganizing for its new functions and securing its necessary staff of experts and otherwise organizing its necessary machinery; it was building up a highly technical personnel.

Still, Mr. President, in face of that statement the fact is disclosed that more changed rates went into effect in 1924 than in 1928. But in his further zeal to retain the provision in the law, and basing the necessity for it upon the ground of haste, of expedition, in meeting changed conditions, the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said:

"These economic and political changes arise in the interim between general congressional revisions of the tariff law. These changes frequently constitute emergencies that call for prompt action. The element of time becomes all important."

I think, Mr. President, that the Senator from Utah could better bottom his contention upon the theory that it is an effort to take the tariff out of politics. I do not think he can contend that the administration of the law has served with any degree of efficiency so far as hastening or expediting changes in rates is concerned.

Adverting now to what the Senator from Arkansas said a while ago, the action of the committee presided over by the Senator from Utah obviously and incontestably means that in the judgment of the committee, after consuming all of that time, the Tariff Commission made an error in virtually every case which it reviewed and in relation to which it acted, because the committee has almost universally overridden what the Commission did; it has changed the rate in nearly every case—to be exact, in 29 out of 37 cases—thereby placing the committee in the incontestable attitude of asserting that, after consuming all of this time, the Tariff Commission fell into an error in practically every case where action has been taken.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said about delegating the authority to change tariff rates. Frequent reference has been made to the case of Hampton against United States, reported in Two Hundred and Seventy-sixth United States Reports, page 394. It may be that the power to delegate this authority to levy duties cen be justified upon some theory other than by an analogy between this kind of a case and the delegation of rate-making power in relation to interstate commerce. I assert that there is not the slightest legal analogy between vesting the rate-making power in the Interstate Commerce Commission, its action in each case being subject to review by a judicial tribunal of competent jurisdiction, and delegating the power to tax money out of the pockets of the people of this country in such a way that there is no review, no redress, and no appeal to any judicial form. Yet the Hampton case rests, at least in part, upon an attempted analogy between those two propositions.

It is said that the Hampton case follows the case of Field v. Clark (143 U.S. 649). Indeed, Field against Clark was cited in the Hampton case. In Field against Clark, Mr. President, the facts were that by the very terms of the tariff act there involved certain enumerated commodities were placed upon the free list, but the act itself expressly provided that when the President canvassed the situation and ascertained that other nations were imposing duties upon commodities produced here and imported into those countries, which brought about an unequal economic condition, and he should issue a proclamation to that effect, then and thereupon, by the terms of the act itself, by operation of its own provisions, if you please, the rates specified in the act should go into effect and should apply thereafter. Those commodities should no longer be free. They were automatically subject to duty at the rates specified in the act.

The President did not tax in that case; the President fixed no rates. The situation there was that the Congress itself withheld the imposition of duties upon certain commodities until and unless a certain condition existed; but when the President canvassed the situation, and by proclamation declared the condition to exist, then, by operation of the act of Congress itself, a duty was levied upon each of the specified commodities. In that case, however, the Executive had no power to change any rate, upward or downward; all he could do was to issue a proclamation resulting in the imposition of a duty under the terms of the act itself. The Congress, by virtue of its own declaration, withheld or suspended the imposition of duties upon each of those commodities until a certain condition obtained, whereupon the terms of the act itself were brought into play. That was an act of repose. It was one of suspension. It withheld its operative effect until the President proclaimed the existence of a certain condition, whereupon its own fixed and specified rates became operative. The edict of Congress fixed the rates. Yet it is argued that under that case it is constitutional to delegate to the Tariff Commission and the President together—the executive branch of the Government—the power to lay duties, exact payment of taxes from the pockets of the people of this country.

Mr. President, the victory of the Anglo-Saxon race in the struggle not to be taxed except through their duly elected representatives is one that we cherish; it is one that we hold dear; it is one for which a tremendous price was gloriously paid. Now we are asked to delegate to the executive department, for an indefinite period in the future, the power to tax through action of appointees not elected by the people and not responsible to the electorate of the country—members of a commission who function in a chamber where the light of publicity is excluded.

The Senator from Utah, however, notwithstanding the serious question of policy, can better justify the system upon this theory than he can upon the idea of promptly meeting changed economic conditions or in saying that the element of time is all important. Mr. President, it would bankrupt the English language to describe adequately the miserable failure in the administration of this law if its sole purpose is to expedite and meet promptly changed economic conditions. If that is the theory on which the proposal rests, I think it will come under the condemnation of a majority of this body and that we shall revert to the theory of laying taxes and levying duties only through an act of Congress rather than giving that precious power to a commission in the executive department of the Government.

I know, Mr. President, that indifference is marked when a discussion of the prerogatives of the different departments of the Government is under way. I am conscious of the fact that there is a disturbing indifference to discussion of those fundamental principles. I think, Mr. President, they are of sufficient importance to justify a repetition here and frequent consideration of them elsewhere. I think the time will come in the not-far-distant future when we shall swing back to a higher degree of respect for those fundamentals of government which so much concerned the founders of the Republic. At least that is my earnest hope.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Oct. 1, 1929]

Mr. BARKLEY. However, my admiration for the work of the Tariff Commission in that respect, my confidence in the unselfish attempt on the part of its experts to obtain information for the benefit of Congress and for the benefit of the President, does not in any way cloud my judgment as to the propriety of the delegation of power involved in the pending amendment.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania—who, I regret, is not on the floor at present—undertook to justify this delegation of power by going back to the year 1794, in the administration of George Washington, and making reference to an act of that year, passed by many men in the Congress who had been members of the Constitutional Convention, and signed by the President of the United States, who happened to be the president of the convention which wrote the Constitution; and he said:

"Surely if these men, who ought to have known what the Constitution meant, who ought to have had some conception of its powers and obligations, saw fit, almost within the shadow of the convention hall in Philadelphia, to confer upon the first President power to issue embargoes, and" as the Senator from Pennsylvania inaccurately said "to fix rates of duty upon commerce, we ought not to hesitate to do it now."

Mr. President, the exercise of that power in 1794 was not the exercise of the taxing power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. In the act referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania there is no mention of duties or imposts. There is no attempt to delegate to the President the power to levy taxes, the power either to increase or decrease rates; but the delegation of power in the act of 1794 was purely a delegation of war power because of the situation that then existed, with an impending or threatening conflict between the United States and France and possible difficulties between the United States and Great Britain.

In order that the Senate may understand precisely what this act did, I shall read it. It is very brief. It is the act of June 4, 1794:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered, whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, or upon the ships and vessels of the United States, or the ships and vessels of any foreign nation, under such regulations as the circumstances of the case may require, and to continue or revoke the same, whenever he shall think proper. And the President is hereby fully authorized to give all such orders to the officers of the United States as may be necessary to carry the same into full effect: Provided, The authority aforesaid shall not be exercised while the Congress of the United States shall be in session. And any embargo, which may be laid by the President as aforesaid, shall cease and determine in 15 days from the actual meeting of Congress next after laying the same."

So that, Mr. President, in the exercise of a war power that might be found necessary during a recess or vacation of Congress, the President of the United States was not authorized to lay and collect taxes. He was not authorized to transfer commodities from one classification to another. He was not authorized to reduce or to increase any rate of tariff taxation or any other form of taxation which had been enacted by the Congress, but he was merely given the power to lay an embargo, not only upon foreign ships that might be in our ports or might be headed to our ports but upon American ships transporting commerce between the United States and every other country; and even in that effort to delegate the war power to the President it was provided that it should not be exercised at any time when Congress should be in session, and that the power conferred upon the President, or any embargo laid by him under that authority, should cease within 15 days after the assembling of Congress next after the proclamation had been issued.

So it does not seem quite appropriate for the Senator from Pennsylvania to seek to persuade us that because one-hundred-and-forty-odd years ago Congress empowered a President to lay an embargo upon commerce with certain foreign countries we are to take that as an example of the right or power of Congress to delegate to the President authority to levy and collect taxes.

I presume that it is, as some Senators have suggested, purely academic to discuss the constitutionality of a law upon which the Supreme Court has passed judgment; and if we are prepared to admit that the discussion of that decision and the wisdom or propriety of it is beyond cavil or question, we are at least not denied the right to discuss the wisdom of the policy. In order that we may understand what the Constitution did, what its environment may have been, what was in the minds of the framers, it may not be entirely out of place to draw briefly a picture of the background which was responsible for it.

Our forefathers met in convention to protest against the exercise of the taxing power by the King of England without the consent of the Colonies. It was not because they objected to the size of the stamp tax. It was not because they objected to the form of that taxation as compared with any other form of taxation that might have been laid upon the Colonies by the British Crown. It was not, either, because they objected to being taxed, because it would have been infinitely cheaper, infinitely more easy and more convenient for the colonists to have submitted to the pittance of a tax as compared to the enormous expense in treasure and blood involved in resisting the power of the mother country to tax them without giving them a voice in the processes of taxation. So when the framers of our Constitution—many of whom had been soldiers in that war, all of whom understood the fundamental doctrines that underlay that war, many of whom had been members of the convention that promulgated the Declaration of Independence—met in Philadelphia to write a constitution, they had behind them the whole history of Anglo-Saxon conflicts of authority between the people and the Crown. And so we must, if we can, undertake to insert our eyes into their bosoms to find what actuated them in writing this Constitution under which we have lived for nearly a century and a half.

I do not desire to discuss the academic question of the wisdom of the separation of our powers into executive, legislative, and judicial; but I do desire to emphasize, if I may—and emphasis seemingly is needed now—the impropriety and the short-sightedness of undertaking to shirk the responsibility which in my judgment was irrevocably placed upon the shoulders of Congress.

I desire rather to approach this subject from the standpoint not only of its constitutionality but the wisdom of the course which is urged upon us by both sides to the controversy.

In the Constitutional Convention which produced the instrument under which our Government has grown and prospered there were lengthy discussions as to the functions of the three branches of the Government which were to be established. The framers of the Constitution had before them the background of events out of which had grown the Revolution and the independence of the Colonies. They were particular to emphasize their determination that all legislative functions should be performed by the representatives of the people. Therefore, one of the first things which they provided was that "all legislative power shall be vested in a Congress composed of a Senate and House of Representatives," and so forth.

What did they mean by all legislative power? Did they mean all legislative power except that which Congress might at a later date attempt to shirk? Did they mean all legislative power except the power of taxation? Every part of the Constitution answers these questions in the negative. In later articles and clauses of the instrument taxation is dealt with specifically so that we cannot doubt that the Constitution intended that all tax legislation, as well as other legislation, should be vested in the Congress.

As stipulated that all legislative power should be vested in Congress, the framers proceeded to outline some of the exclusive powers of Congress, among them being—

"The power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises."

What is the legislative power? The power to promulgate a rule of action by which the people who are subject to that law are to be governed in their relationship not only to one another but to this thing we call government, which is only another name for organized society. Therefore, we are compelled to draw the conclusion that among the powers included in the definition of legislative power must be included the power of taxation; for it was upon the principle of taxation largely that our independence as a Nation was established in all of the documents that accompanied our separation from the mother country. It was in the debates of the Constitutional Convention, for in that Convention there were present, as there are always present in the inception of governments and in the exercise of their authority, two distinct schools of thought. One school believed that we should not confer power upon the people, and that only the educated and the well born and the wealthy should be clothed with the power of self-government, and that such blessings as the masses might enjoy under the Government should fall into their mouths as the crumbs fell into the mouth of Lazarus from the table of Dives.

On the other hand, there was the opposite of that theory, to which I have already referred, that, without regard to distinctions of wealth, without regard to distinctions of physical power or prowess, without regard to ancestry, without regard to education or ignorance, every man upon whose shoulders lay the responsibility to support his government, either by his own blood or by his money in the form of taxes, was entitled to representation in the body that levied those taxes upon him and compelled him to pay them.

Therefore, Mr. President, the language of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power of exclusive legislation must have included the power of taxation, because taxation is legislation, and has always been recognized, not only in our country but in the world at large, as the exercise of legislative power. Not only is it recognized as legislation on the part of the National Government but in every State constitution in the 48 States of the American Union the right to levy and collect taxes is an exclusive right which is conferred upon the legislature of the State, and in no State constitution with which I am familiar is there any authority given to lay and collect taxes, to raise or lower income taxes or property taxes, by even so much as a penny, that may come out of the pockets of the people of that Commonwealth.

What kind of taxation does this power relate to? The Constitution does not specify or limit. It does not attempt to segregate the different methods of taxation. Therefore, it must include all forms of taxes which can be levied.

It includes not only tariff duties but income taxes and all other forms of taxation which the Federal Government may levy and collect to raise revenues for its support.

Taking the background of Anglo-Saxon history, the cause of the Revolution itself, which was the claim of the mother country that it had the right to tax Americans without their consent, we cannot believe that this provision or any provision of the Constitution was intended, or contemplated that taxes could be levied by any other authority than the Congress of the people, chosen by them, responsible to them, and subject to be removed by them at frequent elections.

President Hoover must have had in mind this background when, on October 15, 1928, in the city of Boston, he uttered this sentiment:

"The Tariff Commission is a most valuable arm of the Government. It can be strengthened and made more useful in several ways. But the American people will never consent to delegating authority over the tariff to any commission, whether nonpartisan or bipartisan. Our people have the right to express themselves at the ballot on so vital a question as this.

"There is only one commission to which delegation of that authority can be made. That is the great commission of their own choosing, the Congress of the United States and the President. It is the only commission which can be held responsible to the electorate."

And so forth. What did the President have in mind when he used that language? Did he have in mind possible action by either of these agencies without the cooperation of the other? His language admits no such interpretation. He meant the orderly process under the Constitution of enactment by both Houses of Congress and the approval of the President, both of which are required to complete an act of legislation.

Not only did the framers of the Constitution confer the exclusive power upon Congress to levy and collect taxes, but they limited the power to initiate such taxation. In section 7 of article I it is provided that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

Why was this limitation placed in the Constitution? Because the framers were so determined to retain in the hands of the people power over their purse that they were not willing for any other branch or subdivision of the Government to start the processes of taxation except that branch which was directly responsible to them, which could be punished or rewarded for their course in all matters of taxation and expenditure.

Under the Constitution the Senate, even though now Senators are elected by the people and are responsible to them, cannot originate a tax bill. It cannot originate a measure laying one dollar in taxes upon the American people. Yet we are seriously asked to delegate to the President a power which we do not ourselves possess.

For, you may gloss it over by any language that suits your fancy, when the President by an Executive order increases the taxes which must be paid by the American people, he originates a measure for raising revenue, a thing which the Senate of the United States cannot do.

We are told that this delegation of legislative authority is wise and proper, because it is limited in scope; that the President can only raise or reduce rates of tariff taxation to the extent of 50 percent of the rates fixed by Congress.

But if it is constitutional and wise to permit him to undo the work of Congress to the extent of 50 percent, why not give him full sweep of power to fix all rates, to reduce them or increase them according to his inclinations?

Why deny to unprotected, and maybe helpless, industries any relief whatever under this benign arrangement, when it may be that those which Congress has neglected need assistance more than those who have received a portion of what they demand? If we can abdicate a portion of the exclusive constitutional power with which Congress was invested by the forefathers, why stop at a portion? Why not let Congress relieve itself of all the burdens of drudgery in matters of taxation and turn it over to the Executive?

And if we have the power, and it is wise, to abdicate our constitutional responsibility in the levying of tariff duties in the way of taxation for raising revenue, why not abdicate it with reference to all forms of taxation?

If the Executive is more prompt and more wise in changing rates of tariff taxation, why is he less prompt and less wise in the matter of changing rates of income taxes?

We are told that there will be a surplus in the Treasury at the end of the year that will justify another reduction in taxes.

Then why waste the time and the money of the people by holding or prolonging a session of Congress to reduce the income taxes? Why not delegate to the President the power to reduce income-tax rates so as to absorb the expected surplus? And if this would be wise and proper, why not also clothe him with power to raise income-tax rates when there is an approaching deficit in the Treasury?

The exclusive power to levy taxes is exclusive as to all forms of taxation; and if we can delegate a part of it as to one form of taxation, we can delegate a portion or all of it as to all forms of taxation.

* * * * * * *

Not only did the framers of the Constitution propose to hold Congress responsible to the people for the amount of revenue raised for the Government, and the manner of its assessment and collection, but they also proposed to hold Congress responsible for its expenditure. For in section 8, article I, of the Constitution, in the enumeration of its powers, it is provided that Congress shall have power "to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years."

Would any person contend that Congress could delegate to the President, or to any other agency, the power to extend an appropriation for the Army for a longer period than 2 years?

In paragraph 7 of section 9, article I, the Constitution says:

"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law," and so forth.

Would it be seriously contended that Congress could delegate to the President or any other agency the power to draw money from the Treasury without the passage of a law providing for its expenditure?

Congress cannot abdicate its authority over the money in the National Treasury, and it cannot properly do it with reference to the collection of that money in the form of taxes.

But we are told by some of the advocates of this congressional surrender that Congress is slothful, slow of action, and cannot act with that precision and foresight which is necessary to those who are in a hurry.

We are told that Congress is possessed of nothing but incapacity; that it cannot obtain the facts upon which tariff legislation should be based; that it engages in logrolling and back scratching, as a result of which unjust and indefensible rates are inflicted upon the people; that it can only revise the tariff once in many years; and that somebody else ought to have the power to revise it piecemeal during these congressional lapses into innocuous desuetude.

We have heard dignified and venerable Senators, who are suspected of a desire to be returned here, denounce both branches of Congress in terms which make it difficult to understand why they would want to remain in such company.

We are told that Congress can only engage in tariff revision at long intervals, and that even if it desires or is capable of dealing with limited articles it cannot do so because of delays and the inclusion of other articles.

This has not been the history of Congress. It is true that a general revision of all the schedules generally requires several months. But it has required several years for the Tariff Commission to investigate single items and report them to the President under the flexible provisions of the present law. I say this not in criticism, but merely as the statement of a fact.

But Congress has on numerous occasions dealt with a limited number of schedules or even items in matters of tariff rates and has been able to produce legislative results with promptness and certainty.

* * * * * * *

These are but a few instances to confound those who put forth the spurious claim that Congress cannot be relied upon to act with promptness and effectiveness, even in the passage of tariff bills, when the circumstances justify prompt and effective action.

Those who seek this unwise departure are not actuated by the fear that Congress will not act. They desire to take the enactment of tariff legislation away from the representatives of the people, away from public discussion, away from the view of the people to the quiet precincts of secrecy, where the people who have to bear the burden and pay the tribute will not know what is happening to them until it is too late to protest.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Ohio evidently fails to catch the drift of my argument. I am not contending that Congress can pass a general tariff bill as rapidly as it can pass a measure with a single item or schedule affecting the rates in all schedules. What I am attempting to do is to show that whenever Congress is confronted with a necessity, with an emergency, with the facts before it as to a limited number of items, it can act more promptly and more efficiently than can the executive branch of the Government, and can act much more promptly and efficiently and expeditiously than has been done by the Tariff Commission up to date; although I do not say that in criticism of the Tariff Commission but merely as a statement of a fact. What I am saying is that upon a report by the Tariff Commission to the Congress of the United States setting forth the facts with respect to any item of taxation in the tariff law, we can promptly act upon that recommendation without delay, as has been shown even when we have had no report from a tariff commission and when we were required to rely upon our own information, gathered more or less at random from whatever sources were available, in considering the wisdom of an increase or a decrease in the tariff rate on a given commodity. Under the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which, I understand, we shall accept as a part of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons], when such a bill is introduced after a report from the Tariff Commission and is being considered by either House of Congress any amendment not germane to that item is not permissible under the law, and it is not permissible even now in the House of Representatives under the rules which are in vogue there.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no doubt that many instances of that nature would occur. Where a report is made to Congress and under the constitutional provision a bill based on such report originates in the House of Representatives and is passed there and comes here with a report from the Tariff Commission, I have not any doubt whatever that such a measure would receive prompt and almost unanimous approval of the Senate of the United States, which would be in compliance with my conception of my duty as a member of the legislative branch of our Government. So, Mr. President, because that can be done and will be done, there is certainly no reason why this great taxing power should be delegated to anybody except the representatives of the people as provided in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, we frequently hear criticism hurled against the legislative branch of our Government by men on the outside, and sometimes by Members of the Congress itself. We are told that we are slothful and inefficient. It is only a continuation and prolongation of the fear which found expression at the Constitutional Convention and among the Tories of the Colonies who refused to cooperate with the patriots in establishing independence, that the people are incompetent to govern themselves; that they ought not to be allowed by the right to choose their representatives. Even now we hear reactionary men declare that the Senate of the United States has deteriorated very materially and substantially since the people were given the right to elect United States Senators.

Mr. President, I have faith in this body and I have faith in the other body which is a coordinate branch of the Legislature of this Nation. Whenever I lose faith in the honesty and in the integrity and the ability and single-mindedness of the two branches of Congress, then will I lose faith in the people of our country and of all countries and of all parliamentary governments. I hope the time may never come when I will lose so much confidence in the exercise by the American people of the right to have a voice in their legislation and in the choice of their representatives and then lose faith in those men when they have been chosen, that I would be willing to crawl out from under any part of the responsibility placed upon me by that Constitution.

I do not believe, in spite of all their frailties and shortcomings, that the American people are yet ready to surrender this great power to levy taxes upon them and to expend the money after it has been received in the Treasury as revenue of the Government. For that reason I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons] and the amendment offered to that amendment by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in the hope that they may be adopted.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly much of the unfavorable sentiment that has been voiced against the Congress, perhaps particularly against the Senate, and especially in connection with the tariff, has arisen from a growing feeling of our incompetency. We have created conditions with respect to tariff complexities that make congressional control of the tariff necessarily difficult; and then we turn with zest for refuge to bureaucracy, and sink still further into a mire. Such in general is the present state of the public mind that we turn to meet every evil with boards to regulate, direct, control, and even imprison the private citizen for breaches even of bylaws of these subordinate arms of the Government. And then comes a fresh crop of evils and more boards. Edmund Burke hit off this state of mind and this practice by saying that there is inherent degradation and oppression in the acts of a central government always "as it descends from a kingdom to a province, from a province to a parish, and from a parish to a private house."

The growing tendency, upon the basis of the theory of time-saving and securing efficiency, of abandoning direct and complete control of lawmaking by the elected representatives of the people is the great menace of our times. We have gone too far in that direction already; and furthermore we have discredited ourselves when we have created commissions and boards innumerable and given them carte blanche power to direct and control the interests of our people, subject only to the limitations of the courts in cases where they obviously and flagrantly exceed their authority. Another challenge is here and we must meet it. Just now it is the shunting and dismissing of tariff discussion, tariff consideration, and tariff control from the Congress to a bureau—to an agency of the Government other than that provided for lawmaking by the Constitution.

Let me remind you that whatever excuse and justification you have had in the past in delegating the power and responsibility of the Congress to indirect agencies, that excuse has passed; and especially with respect as to this subject of taxation above all others. If you recall to mind the story of the struggles and the sacrifices of your forefathers and their imperishable words, your eyes should be open now. Here and now you are dealing with a subject that no human being can say was outside and beyond the domain of the deliberations and plans of the founders of this country. And for 140 years the exclusive right of exercising the taxing power has been preserved in the form that the Constitution prescribed. However else we may have abridged or compromised the basic principles of the Constitution, we at least have not abandoned this one.

Gentlemen, you are engaged in an assault upon parliamentary government. No one can foresee where this movement will lead or end. One thing is certain; it risks the beginning of the end of that fundamental principle upon which our institutions were built, our happiness secured, and our prosperity maintained up to the present hour. This proposed change would not even be thought of except it is the fashion of the time to belittle and discredit parliamentary government. But the tragedy of it all is that we ourselves are joining in the movement to undermine parliamentary government, which means to put ourselves in the limbo of rejected things.

I repeat, in order that there be no misunderstanding and scuttling behind fogs or imaginary issues, that the primary, the crucial, and the final question here is: Shall we abdicate and relinquish the taxing power and place it where the Constitution expressly forbids it to be placed? Do not plead that it is only partial; that it is confined and limited by a rule; that it is only temporary. It is the step that counts and in all probability one that counts finally. The first proposal in 1922 was only for 2 years; and then that limitation was abandoned. At first it was to be greatly safeguarded and restricted; now it is proposed to expand it, extend it, and make it permanent.

You say the need is to provide a means of meeting an emergency. What would you think of a proposal giving the President the authority to increase the Army or the Navy upon investigation and advice by boards of Army or Navy officers, whenever he deemed an emergency existed? If increase of power and responsibility in the field of taxation when emergencies exist can safely and advantageously be lodged in the President, why not let him be the judge of the extent of preparations that are necessary to provide for public defense without the concurrence of the Congress? Why stop at the mere protection or safeguarding of property? Is not the protection of life and the defense of the country of greater moment?

Mr. President, during this entire discussion no wholehearted or sincere words of commendation have been expressed for the manner in which thus far the flexible tariff has functioned. Throughout the discussions there has been criticism and an expression of general lack of confidence. Even the proponents of the measure have been apologetic. But in the very breath that they allege that things have not been as they ought to have been, and that the results have not been as expected, they urge us to continue the abandonment of our powers because, forsooth, the future will resuscitate, remodel, and restore the particular example of bureaucracy that thus far has failed. The servant has been unfaithful in some things, so make him ruler over many.

Reform! Drive politics out of a department of government that deals with a question that is saturated with political philosophy fought over in every political conflict by every political party since the beginning of the Nation! Do you think that by delegating this power that a candidate for the Senate can be elected to office in Louisiana by stating that the sugar question has been removed from politics and is in the custody of a mere fact-finding commission, and that the people of Louisiana must appeal not to their Senators for relief but hereafter to a fact-finding board that has already decreed their sugar protection excessive? Do you think any Senator, be he Democrat or Republican, elected in Massachusetts can escape declaring to distressed industries that the tariff is now taken care of by officials outside the Halls of Congress and that he is powerless? What of the Senators from other States? What will you say to a constituent after a fact-finding commission has refused an application for tariff revision? Are Senators from the woolgrowing and from the lumber States going to sit down and fold their hands now that you have passed a law taking this authority in large part from yourselves?

I dislike to prophesy, but a statesman must do it. The founders did it, they looked back and saw the awful story that history revealed, and that they had personally experienced, of the usurpation of the power of taxation. And then they prophesied that history would repeat itself here in America unless the control of the people's pocketbook and the control of commerce through the imposing of taxes was separated clearly and absolutely from the Executive and kept on the broadest basis possible. They were not so guileless as we, or shall I say such trucklers to expediency? They were students of the science of government. They were sagacious. Well they knew that lodging power in the hands of one man makes for celerity and efficiency; but they also knew that something else was of vastly more consequence. They were willing to make certain sacrifices of efficiency for greater ends. They preferred less efficiency and the retention of liberty, rather than the maximum of efficiency with the possibility of despotic abuse.

After all is said and done is not the answer to the impression that visitors to these galleries receive, and frequently express, of our apparent inefficiency and other shortcomings summed up succinctly in the words of the French leader when criticism was made of the delay and disorderly conduct of the French Assembly: "These are the manners of liberty"?

If there is one idea more than any other that I have been impressed with as I read the stirring story of the deliberations and struggles for the founding of this Republic, and studied the political philosophy of its creators, it has been this: That they were not unmindful of the possibility that the form of government which they outlined might in time bring to their descendants tyranny, but they were convinced, first, that if that tyranny came it was more likely to come through abuse of the taxing power than any other, and, secondly, that it was better to have that abuse come through the failure of many rather than of one. In a word, they believed that since abuses could not be foreseen or surely prevented, they were in the long run less likely to come through their parliament than through some of the other agencies of government which they necessarily provided for; and consequently they lodged, first of all, the taxing power, permanently, as they thought, in the charge of our parliament—the American Congress.

I said I would venture to prophesy, and here is what I do not hesitate to say, weighing the responsibility of my words, that this decision to make the flexible provisions of this tariff a permanent policy of our Government, for that is what it amounts to, means the end of a scientific judicially minded commission, and it likewise means the end of tariff reviews in the open before the country by the Congress.

The personnel of the United States Tariff Commission, and I say this without any desire to enter into the realm of discussion of personality, since the Commission began the administration of the flexible tariff, has become more political. Previous to 1922 it may not have done much, for it was only starting, but what it did was scientific and commanded respect. Men of scientific integrity and purpose were sought and obtained both for commissioners and for leading positions on the staff. With the coming of the flexible tariff the whole complexion of the Commission changed, a new type of commissioner was appointed, and the better members of the staff resigned and were replaced by inferior and more subservient assistants. It could not be otherwise. The change in the work was from investigation and research removed from politics to research, investigation, and decision controlled by politics. What has happened is inherent in an institution dealing with such a highly political subject, which is possessed with the power to loosen or bind men's wages and profits through governmental action.

What we did then and what we are doing now, if this proposal succeeds, is to transfer political conniving, scheming, improper suggestions of every kind from this open public forum to a commission that necessarily does its work away from the public eye. Is there any Senator on this floor who seriously doubts that pressure of tremendous proportions will not be exerted with success in naming in the future to this law-altering body textile commissioners, wool commissioners, sugar commissioners, lumber commissioners, and that men will also be appointed as members of the staff for the purpose of protecting and insuring the supposed rights of particular industries and interests?

You say that intrigue, scheming, and conniving is here in the Congress. True; but it is brought to bear on 600 men and not on 6 men who are the appointees and advisers of 1 man. You say that politics in tariff making is here. Yes; but here it is in the open; it is a recognized and expected part, unfortunate and, I fear, unavoidable of the surroundings and functioning of parliamentary government. What an exalted opinion of the immunity from political pressure and subtle suggestions and possession of infallibility you place in bureaus and in the Presidential office: How you do look guilelessly for a miracle!

Why are these things here? It is because we are engaged in the business of handing over favors and benefits through the possession of the opportunity and power to grant, in the exercise of our discretion, the demands of selfish and greedy interests. Our necessarily plenary power with respect to taxation gives us the power to abuse it; but there are limits to abuse in our hands. There is none when it is concentrated and out of sight.

Mr. President, there have been some momentous debates and decisions in the Senate of the United States, but none that were fraught with more serious consequences for the future of our country and for the welfare of the people than the decision we are making now. It is more than a fight between old-fashioned constitutionalism and modern constitutionalism, as it has been called. It is a fight to safeguard parliamentary government against the usurpation of the taxing power.

I see in vision a future day when men sitting in our places here will turn back the pages of the record of this body to scan the names and the motives of those who changed the settled policy of 140 years and turned this most sacred, precious, and dangerous power—that even to destroy property and freedom of action—into an uncharted political course that every liberty seeker familiar with the science and experience of government has hitherto renounced and avoided.

Senators, pause, I plead with you, before you vote for such a destructive interference with the liberties and rights of our people.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Oct. 2, 1929]

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement issued and published on September 30 by the minority members of the Senate Finance Committee setting forth their objections to the flexible provisions of the tariff law.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"JOINT STATEMENT BY THE MINORITY MEMBERS OF THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE

"A question of far-reaching consequences transcending considerations of party prompts us to issue a public statement in relation to the so-called "flexible provisions" of the tariff bill now pending before the Senate.

"The question involved is one that in our opinion strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of the Government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

"Whatever argument could be advanced during the war and immediately following for delegation to a degree of the taxing power to the Executive unquestionably no longer exists. To incorporate now in the law any recognition of a right of the Executive to impose taxes without the concurrence of the legislative branch is without justification.

"Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable. It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government, for which the independence of the country was attained and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

"There is no issue here as to the integrity of any Executive who has had or may have extended to him the exercise of this power. The issue is one of taxation by one official, be he president or monarch, in contrast to taxation by the representatives of the people elected, intrusted exclusively with the power to seize the property of the citizen through taxation. If proof be needed that the danger which the forefathers foresaw is inherent in this issue, a mere casual inquiry into the methods employed, selfish influences used, sinister schemes and contrivances brought to bear, one need but examine the record.

"PROCESS HELD VIRTUALLY SECRET

"The principle is: Are taxation laws and their application to be made virtually in secret, whatever may be said about a limiting rule, or are they to be enacted by the responsible representatives of the people in the Congress, where public debate is held and a public record made of each official's conduct?

"The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character is tyranny. Resistance to the impairment of this popular right has largely occasioned many of the wars and revolutions of the past.

"An issue of this importance should not be associated with the opinions or necessities of those interests, States, or sections that directly profit by some rate schedule in the body of the tariff act. With respect to the principle here at stake any trading or logrolling is especially unjustifiable and indefensible. Neither should we be unduly influenced by the attempt to divert attention from this momentous issue by condemnation of and emphasis upon the dilatory and unsatisfactory results of congressional procedure.

"POINT TO AMENDMENTS

"No one seeks to prevent or in any way to interfere with the investigations and reports of the Tariff Commission in connection with emergency tariff legislation. The point is, we emphatically insist that final action and responsibility based on Tariff Commission reports shall be taken by the Congress.

"For the purpose of preventing apprehended congressional delay an amendment has been made providing for the submission of the reports to the Congress by the President, and furthermore, an amendment will be presented strictly limiting action by the Congress to matters germane to the particular subject matter or rates recommended by the President after investigation by the Tariff Commission.

"We do not hesitate to say that if this extraordinary and what we believe to be unconstitutional authority passes now from the Congress, it is questionable if there will ever again be a tariff bill originated and enacted by the Congress.

"It is our solemn judgment that hereafter all taxation through the tariff and regulation of commerce thereby will be made by the Executive. It is the inherent tendency of this tariff-changing device and the apparently conscious purpose of its proponents to use it to keep the tariff out of Congress, where it is such an embarrassing business, as everybody knows, to the party that profits politically by it. So also it will be of distinct advantage to the interests that are the direct beneficiaries of the tariff.

"In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his Government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.

"In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad and public view of this important public question, we make this appeal."

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I do not expect to add much to the splendid addresses which have been delivered upon this all-important question. The debate has gone to the fundamentals of government and in character measures up to the debates which have occurred in the palmiest days of this Republic or in any legislative body of the world where the rights of the people were being fought for in opposition to executive or arbitrary power. The speeches we have heard in opposition to the flexible provision of the tariff bill have been worthy of Burke, worthy of Chatham, worthy of Mirabeau, and worthy of the fathers of this Government, who sounded the clarion note for popular rights. The arguments which have been advanced in behalf of the flexible provision of the tariff bill, placing in the hands of the President the right to give favors and the right to impose taxes upon the people, embody exactly the same excuses which have been made from time immemorial in behalf of arbitrary and one-man power. They have added nothing to all of the excuses which have heretofore been made for the bestowal of such power.

I wish in a brief way to present this issue so that the American people may clearly and distinctly understand it. First, I wish to state in what respects both sides of this controversy agree, and then I wish to point out where they part company.

Both sides to the controversy agree that there should be a Tariff Commission. Both sides to the controversy agree that that Tariff Commission should be empowered to ascertain all the facts, all the information, scientifically and thoroughly, as to the cost of production abroad and the cost of production in America, in order to frame a reasonable, scientific, fair, and just tariff, which will be protective of American interests. There is no difference of opinion as to that; we all equally agree to the provision for the creation of a fact-finding tariff commission.

After the Commission shall have performed its work, after it shall have ascertained the facts, after it shall have made a thorough and scientific investigation, we then part company. A portion of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, constituting a majority, say that the facts thus thoroughly and scientifically found shall be sent to the President, and that his judgment, his will, shall make those findings operative.

Senators on this side of the Chamber say that, when ascertained by this method, the facts as to the cost of production at home and abroad should be sent to the Congress, and that the congressional will and congressional action alone should make effective those findings of the Tariff Commission. There is where the difference between Senators on either side of the Chamber is specific and well defined. However, it has been sought to impress the country with the idea that we are trying to destroy the Tariff Commission by advocating a provision that will send the report to Congress for action and not to the President.

The issue now presented has been an issue from time immemorial. It is, Shall the taxing power in a nation be placed in the hands of one man or shall the people reserve that power to themselves and exercise it as their will and their judgment may dictate? That is a conflict that has existed in the world since man first became civilized. It is fundamental; it is far-reaching; it cannot be shirked. That is the issue here today, and no subterfuge, no sophistry can avoid that one specific issue.

Mr. President, I am opposed to sending the information obtained by the Tariff Commission to the President; I favor sending it to Congress; and I shall give my reasons for my position. First, I am opposed on historical grounds, by tradition, and because of what history and its proven truths tell mankind, to conferring such power on the President. How was America settled? What were the conditions under which this Nation was founded? The world was dominated by executives and despots. The Cortes of Spain had been abolished when America was settled, and the will of the King of Spain was the law of three-fifths of the world. The great States-General of France had been abolished; it was not called together again until it met on the eve of the French Revolution. James I had prorogued Parliament and his will was the law of England. The English Parliament did not assemble for 7 years, and during that time James I was the ruler whose dominant will controlled England. With that situation in the world, America was settled by people who believed they had a right to control their own destiny, the right to control the imposition of their own taxes, the right to control their private affairs. For all the world, Mr. President, liberty, popular rights, had but one refuge, and that was in the woods of America. Here we have protected liberty, until now, when it is sought to make an abject surrender of the popular rights of the people which our forefathers would not have thought possible in the great Republic which they founded. This is the issue and it cannot be evaded.

What does it mean when the President is given the power to impose customs duties or tariff taxes on 120,000,000 people? First, that taxes are imposed on the American people by the Executive, and, second, that there is bestowed on the Executive without limit and without stint the power practically of granting monopolies and conferring favors upon anyone according to his own will.

What was the great curse of monarchy? It was the power on the part of the king to grant monopolies to a few to trade in England or in France or in Spain, as the case might be. One of the greatest curses of government until America was settled was the power given to monarchs to show favoritism, to bestow favors upon their particular friends and adherents, to make men rich or poor as the will of the monarch might dictate. In England privileges were given to favorites which resulted in monopolies in the woolen trade, the sugar trade, the cotton industry, and similar favors were bestowed in France and Spain. Court favorites were made rich by the monarchs who had it in their power to bestow such favors. That was one of the abuses denounced in our Declaration of Independence; it was one of the main grievances which resulted in the wrestling of the Magna Carta from King John, for the King could bestow favors to the enrichment of his favorites.

Mr. President, what does the flexible provision propose? It proposes to give the President power to create monopolies in America, if he shall so desire, and to create them for the benefit of favorite interests; it proposes to give the President the power to determine how 120,000,000 people shall trade. Of all the power ever bestowed in the history of time none exceeds the power given the President under this flexible provision of the pending bill to bestow favors and monopolies and benefits on individuals, industries, and corporations according to his own will and desire.

I am opposed to that. When a Senator votes for the flexible provision of the pending bill he votes—and he cannot evade the issue—to give that power, that opportunity to the President without stint and without limit except that the President cannot raise or lower a tariff duty in excess of 50 percent of the rate fixed by the bill. Those who think that such a power as belonged to the kings and potentates of the world in former times should be bestowed upon the President and that the opportunity for favoritism should thus be afforded will vote for the flexible provision of the tariff bill. That is what it means.

In addition to giving to the President this unlimited power of enriching favorites, as he may desire, it confers upon the President the right to impose taxes. I am opposed to that. I think it is contrary to the Constitution. I do not care one iota for the decision which was rendered upholding the flexible provision of the tariff. What did that decision hold? It held that if Congress sees proper to abdicate its power under the Constitution and turn that power over to the President, and if in the opinion of Congress the provisions of the law do not leave any discretion in the President, then the provision is legal. I believe the decision is wrong. From time immemorial it has been held that legislative power cannot be taken away from the Parliament or the Congress when any discretion is left in the exercise of the power on the part of the Executive. That is a fundamental principle. The decision was based on a subterfuge that the flexible provision left no discretion in the President because he was bound by the conditions fixed in the law, but anyone may read the provision and see that it is not specific. It gives the President the discretion to raise tariff duties to the extent of 50 percent of the rates provided in the bill. We should vote according to our idea of the Constitution, regardless of any decision of the Supreme Court.

The founders of the Government, fearful of the taxing power, provided that the people could not be taxed except by Congress and that all tax measures must originate in the House of Representatives. They were so concerned about the taxing power that they provided that the House of Representatives should be elected every 2 years, which is one of the shortest election periods in the history of constitutional government. Yet it is proposed to give to the President the power to impose taxes, to increase tariff rates 50 percent or decrease them 50 percent. When he is given that power, what does it mean? It means that power thus given to him, in the absence of his consent, can only be withdrawn from him by a vote—two-thirds of a majority of the House and of the Senate. If this flexible provision shall be embodied in the law and it is desired subsequently to repeal it or to change it, and the consent of the President cannot be obtained, it can only be repealed or changed by a two-thirds vote. That statement cannot be denied. It means that we confer on the President for all time the power to increase taxes unless two-thirds of Congress shall take that power away from him, for it would take two-thirds to override his veto. So it appears that when Senators vote for the flexible provision they vote to deprive a majority of Congress of the right to handle this matter; they vote to leave it entirely to the President to continue to exercise this power unless he consents to the withdrawal of the power or unless two-thirds of the House and the Senate withdraw it from him. I say that that strikes at the fundamental principle of majority government and is ruinous to our institutions.

Mr. President, under the power granted to the President by the flexible provision, how is it to be exercised? No publicity surrounds the proceedings of the Tariff Commission. The President is not required to act publicly. So the hearings and the proceedings in connection with the operation of the flexible provision are of a star-chamber character. The President can hear a case openly or he can hear it secretly. Six members of the Commission and one other man, the President, without publicity, without the case being presented, can absolutely control the industries, the enterprise, the foreign trade and commerce, and the industrial growth and development of 120,000,000 people, secretly and by means of star-chamber proceedings.

One of the great fights made in England against Charles I and James I was that the rights of England were bartered and sold in star-chamber proceedings, secretly, without publicity, and without knowledge on the part of the people. Yet it is proposed to place our industries, the taxing power, and our entire prosperity in such a position that we cannot compel publicity, but star-chamber and secret proceedings may determine their fate. In Congress it must be done publicly. The votes are public; the debate is public; there is a public record; and the American people know from their representatives who has been true and who has failed.

Who is willing to have the interests of his State controlled, determined, and decided by the star-chamber proceedings of a commission, and a President who is not compelled to have publicity?

It is said that this flexible provision is necessary to prevent a general tariff revision, and every time we want a change we will have to have a prolonged, elaborate tariff debate. To answer that, an amendment was offered to the Simmons amendment by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which provides what? That Congress, the House of Representatives and the Senate, can only consider and vote upon the items sent in the report with the Commission's recommendations. That is exactly what the President would have to do. He would pass on the item. It is sent to him precisely as it is sent to us. He has to accept that item and recommend it; and if it comes to Congress, we have to do the same thing, and cannot change the rate except so far as that item is concerned. That gets rid of all the complaint that it means, general tariff debate and general tariff revision. Consequently that objection disappears.

The next argument advanced is the celerity with which the tariff can be changed under the flexible provision. Now, everybody knows that a President is overworked. The President will hardly have time to read the reports. The President would simply send them to one of his Cabinet members and direct him to pass on them. Everybody knows that he is overworked. Everybody knows that he could not read the evidence. Everybody knows that he could not give it consideration, in view of the great burdens that rest upon him in foreign affairs, in financial affairs, and other numerous matters. Consequently, it simply means that the matter must be referred by the President to a person that we do not know and possibly never heard of.

It is all folly to talk about the President's having an opportunity to investigate the matter, an opportunity to reach a conclusion about it. It is an absolute impossibility; and those who present that view know that it is impossible.

Now, the question is, Can Congress pass upon this item, and either increase or decrease the duty upon it as recommended by the Tariff Commission, or is it better for the President to do it? We will have more celerity, we will have better judgment, it will be a better way to exercise it if Congress does it than if we leave it to the President.

Senators talk about the speed of the procedure. Let us see whether the Tariff Commission is better than the Congress in that respect.

It has been conceded—it is not denied—that in 7 years the Commission has passed on 37 items. A little more than 5 a year has this wonderful Commission been able to consider and reach a conclusion on—a little over 5 a year! There are between four and five thousand items in this bill. I have made an estimate; and I find that at that rate, in order to make a report and have a bill ready for this session of the Senate to act on, the Tariff Commission would have been compelled to meet at the time William the Conqueror went to England in the tenth century and work night and day from that time to this. That would have been necessary in order to have a tariff bill ready now for the action of Congress. This is the speed which these advocates of Executive power invite Congress to approve.

What excuse can exist for the abdication by Congress of its power, its right of publicity, its right of taking care of the interests of the States, and surrendering it to the star-chamber proceedings of a President and of a commission?

Mr. President, these are the views that animate me. I think this is a fundamental question of popular rights and popular liberty. If parliamentary government cannot be sustained in the United States, it is a failure; and yet we are asked practically to abolish parliamentary government, to do it in an unconstitutional way, and to create in America by indirection powers of a President superior to Congress and superior to the people, and a power that we can never withdraw from him without his consent except by having a two-thirds vote in the House and the Senate.

Mr. President, I think this is a serious question. This is the time when we must make a stand for popular rights, for popular liberty, for the right of the people to govern themselves through their parliaments, which is the very principle upon which the American Government and American institutions have been founded.

I am not for creating in America a Mussolini. I am not for creating in American a despot. I am not for creating in America a President with more constitutional powers than any monarch ever possessed, and then supplementing that with power to give riches, wealth, monopoly to his favorites by the flexible provision of a tariff bill.

Mr. President, we cannot shirk the issue. It cannot be shirked. Right here today, when the roll is called, Senators will answer whether they are for popular government, whether they are for the rights of the people, whether they are for constitutional government, whether they intend to let our Constitution continue as it was founded, with the power of taxation by Congress and not by an Executive.

I, for one, have been proud of the eloquent voices that have been raised, the ability that has been displayed, in keeping America true to her traditions, in keeping her true to her institutions as the leader and the champion the world over of popular rights and the liberties of the people, and the right of the people to control their own destiny and make their will law, and not turning it over to the Executive.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 10, 1932]

Mr. HULL. Here comes the giant oil industry, a great $12,000,000,000 business in this country, involving a natural resource which does not cost anybody a penny to create, a great industry which has had to its advantage during the past 10 years a favorable balance of exports in the huge amount of $3,600,000,000, coming here and complacently demanding that the peoples' representatives, the representatives of the American public, shall vote to this huge octopus—and I say that in no spirit of criticism—a special subsidy running up into the hundreds of millions of dollars, to be paid for largely by the 30,000,000 farm population, hopelessly prostrate, overwhelmed with debt, with commodity prices so low it does not pay to remove farm products from the farm; a demand also that the wage-earning population, which, with their families, aggregate sixty to seventy million, together with the agricultural population, shall bear the lion's share of this bald, unadulterated subsidy in the way of an increased price, under tariff shelter, above what the price to the farmer and wage earner would otherwise be.

Our friends who espouse the other and opposing economic course seem to have an idea that when we bring the agencies of Congress and other departments of Government into operation to shut out a few dollars of imports here and there which are trickling into the United States in the way of specialties or novelties or something of the sort, that we are accomplishing some sound and profitable economic purpose. And yet no economic truth is more patent than that whenever we today shut out $1 of imports by these extreme obstructions which we are undertaking to erect from time to time we shut in at least $5 worth of automobiles and foodstuffs and machinery and other surpluses in all industrial and productive lines, including wheat and cotton.

What boots it if a few dollars' worth of oil comes in to some bay or some harbor or locally on the seaboard if we are able in return to send out and sell five times that value in surplus cotton or wheat or automobiles or these other enormous surpluses which are binding down so heavily and almost hopelessly depressing our entire economic situation? Yet wherever and whenever on both oceans somebody finds where a few dollars of imports are trickling in he catches the first train, or perhaps does not wait that long but gets on an airship, and comes through to Washington overnight.

Mr. President, commodity prices have been pulled down and held down to the world level in every instance where they are bought and sold in world markets and where they are produced on a surplus basis by any particular country. I desire to call attention to the facts in order to illustrate where we have gotten after this long string of so-called "remedies" that have been set forth by the administration in charge of the Government. As an illustration for my friends who imagine that they can single out different surplus-producing industries and by the imposition of tariffs lift the prices up ad libitum, let me refer to wheat and sugar, on both of which tariff duties are imposed; to hides, having a tariff; to rubber, which has no tariff; to silk, which has no tariff; to cocoa, which has no tariff; to copper, which has no tariff; to zinc, which has a tariff; to silver and petroleum, which have no tariff protection. Those are 10 commodities of world use, many of which this country itself produces a surplus of. According to the index of wholesale prices, these 10 raw materials on May 16, 1932, had registered a new low all-time price level. Zinc, Mr. President, on which there has been a tariff from the time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, went to 2.38, an all-time low price. Whether we take hides or corn or wheat or oats or rye, zinc or lead, or any other products, of which a substantial surplus is produced and which are commodities of world use, no lesson has been more conclusively learned by intelligent, fair-minded people everywhere than that such tariffs mean nothing, or practically nothing, but they do have this effect——

* * * * * * *

For instance, take the price of corn on which there is a tariff of 25 cents a bushel and which is a world-wide commodity. On the farms on April 15, 1932, it was selling for 31.4 cents a bushel. The price of wheat was 43.1 cents a bushel, with a tariff of 42 cents a bushel upon it. The price of eggs has gone down to 10.2 cents; the price of chickens has gone down to 12.6 cents; the price of butter, with 14 cents a pound tariff, has gone down to 20.1 cents, which is the lowest price for butter in 25 years. Hogs in Chicago are selling as low as 3.53 cents a pound, which is the lowest price in 30 years. Hides are down to 5¾ cents, 56 percent off from 1929, and oats just a few month ago were down to 11 cents on the farm.

* * * * * * *

The second point the President makes is as to tariff protection. He says:

"As a matter of fact there never has been a time in the history of the United States when tariff protection was more essential to the welfare of the American people than at present."

What in the world will be announced next from the White House? That sentence by itself was an impertinence in this sort of a state paper, which, I must say, contains more of sophistry and more of misstatement than any state paper since 1789. This sounds more like a fat-frying veto than a veto based on any sort of economic consideration. It sounds as if an election was approaching and an appeal to the pocketbooks of the chief tariff beneficiaries might be advisable.

The President goes further and refers to the retention of the flexible tariff clause. At the time this clause was enacted I called attention in a speech in the House to the significance of this flexible tariff policy and the effect of the proposed enactment of the present law in the following language:

"I am unalterably opposed to section 315 of the tariff act and demand its speedy repeal. I strongly condemn the proposed course of the Republican Party, which contemplates the enlargement and retention of this provision with such additional authority to the President as would practically vest in him the supreme taxing power of the Nation, contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution—a vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic king."

Mr. President, unless and until the executive department can make permanent the policy of the present Tariff Commission law, with its flexible provision, Congress can lay claim to some semblance of its taxing power under the Constitution, but I deny the right of the executive department practically to assume, to arrogate to itself the chief power of tariff taxation in this country, while it ignores the great law-making body charged with that function and duty under the language of the Constitution.

The President dismisses this entire industrial and domestic trade situation, as it relates to tariffs, by the flippant remark that the Tariff Commission, through the operation of the flexible provision, will be amply able to raise or lower a tariff in response to all the sound needs and demands of industry and commerce in this country, both domestic and international.

There is an issue sharply presented as to whether this hand-picked high-tariff commission, under the domination of the President, who, at the same time, shows an amazing subserviency to the chief tariff beneficiaries of this country, shall be vested with the chief control of tariff making. I am opposed to it, and I believe that the sober second thought of the American people will repudiate this unprecedented and unusual and wholly unjustifiable arrogation of power and authority to the President.

He proceeds a little further by the Smoot-Hawley Act; and I want to say that if I had my way, I would offer a bill to abolish the present rather partisan Tariff Commission and seek the installment of a broad, impartial, fact-finding organization. I would repeal the flexible provision and restore to the Congress its rightful authority in tariff making.

* * * * * * *

The real question goes further back than that. The question is whether a political party in charge of the Government receives substantial campaign contributions from the tariff beneficiaries. Whenever it is permitted to receive such contributions, those beneficiaries sweep down here on Washington and brush aside, and kick aside, if necessary, all agencies or obstructions and write their own embargo rates.

There will be no sound or wholesome tariff legislation in this country until a divorce is effected between politics and vested interests; and we have been sitting here all winter and all spring talking about the superficial and temporary palliatives, and about how the Tariff Commission might function, about scientific tariff revision, but this, the real seat of the trouble, has scarcely been mentioned, if at all. That presents one of the real issues in connection with the President's veto message.

Some of our Democratic and Republican friends imagine we are living 50, 75, or 100 years ago, when the academic question of whether one stands for an ultra high tariff or for moderate tariff or for revenue tariff or for free-trade tariff would become pertinent and timely. The truth is that at this stage of development of our commerce and our tariff and our politics the chief beneficiaries have a strangle hold on the dominant forces in the Republican Party, and they come here as stated and write their own prohibitive tariffs. The question and the task for those who favor moderate tariffs instead of high and still higher tariffs from year to year is to organize themselves together, whether they be moderate protectionists or tariff-for-revenue advocates or free-trade advocates, and make the common fight on this condition to which I have referred. Until they succeed in divorcing and separating the chief beneficiaries of this phase of special privilege and that branch of politics in control of the Government no other step can be successfully taken. It is idle and futile to talk about any other step.

* * * * * * *

The President undertakes to make a wholly erroneous impression that the international conference proposed in the vetoed bill is intended to usurp some of the tariff-making power of this Nation. Nothing is more absurd than that intimation. Nothing was further from the minds of the Members of Congress in dealing with that matter.

I wish for just a moment to call attention to what was really in the minds of those who were in charge of that measure. Speaking of these three proposals embodied in the tariff bill which the President vetoed, in a recent speech I said this:

"The first proposal to this end is for legislation authorizing a permanent world economic conference called by the President, the action of which, more than any other first step, would restore confidence and credit; such conference having for its purposes the development of a spirit of simultaneous tariff revision downward, and liberal commercial policy, mutual agreements eliminating many discriminations in commerce, unshackling international finance, credit and exchange, and liberalizing the network of reprisals, prohibitions, embargoes, and other restraints which accompany the policy of superprotection.

"Second, legislation authorizing the President to negotiate trade agreements based upon mutual tariff concessions and the unconditional most-favored-nation doctrine.

"Third, that the American Congress, with the legislative bodies of other countries acting as nearly in concert as they will, should, according to their own separate and independent judgments, proceed with all necessary preliminary preparations, with the aid on the part of our Congress of an impartial fact-finding commission, for the careful and gradual readjustment downward of existing excessive tariffs with a level of moderate rates that will not permit conditions of domestic price monopoly, and a liberal, fair, and friendly commercial policy as the ultimate objectives. This broad policy would, in addition to impregnable home markets, insure wider and better foreign markets for our surplus, healthier domestic industry, and regular employment at suitable wages for all of our labor. I myself would reorganize the present Tariff Commission, repeal the flexible clause, and adopt a more modified formula for assembling all the facts and factors relating to competitive strength here and elsewhere."

There, Mr. President, is a frank statement of the purely innocent scope and purpose of the international conference proposed in this recent enactment.

All the nations of the world are afflicted with many conditions in common. All have experienced a common falling of commodity prices. All have experienced alike a collapse of credit and undue restrictions of the exchange situation, a hopelessly dislocated financial condition, with resulting monetary instability. All the nations are equally interested in restoring the structure of international trade, now prostrate. All are interested in bringing back to a higher level the commodity price situation. Yet, Mr. President, while every respectable business man and economic authority in the world today agrees that the controlling causes of this panic have now extended themselves to every important country, and that the necessity for some degree of cooperation is patent to every intelligent person, if we are to make satisfactory progress back to a stable and sound business recovery, the President flippantly and carelessly and recklessly vetoes this proposition upon the absurd suggestion that the international economic conference would interfere with our domestic tariff policy.

Why, Mr. President, after all countries under our leadership have raised their tariffs to such heights that they have choked international trade down to its knees, some step to check this constant increase upward is necessary. No plan would be more practical than that of concerted action among all the countries of any importance to the end that they may, as nearly simultaneously as possible, through their domestic parliaments revise tariffs downward in the direction of a moderate level and to the end that the nations of the world may by mutual agreement eliminate many of the retaliatory and unfair trade methods and trade practices which are so conducive to trade strife and declarations of economic war. Of course, we could not get all of them to meet in a 40-acre lot to conduct negotiations to revise tariffs. Who would have thought of such a suggestion except some adviser of the President?

We propose bilateral treaties or treaties negotiated between two countries to revise tariffs downward in a spirit of mutual concession. If after a nation should negotiate half a dozen or more with other nations, they should all meet together and see fit to merge them into a multilateral treaty, and it was mutually acceptable in every way, they might do that. But that is as near as the President's sweeping condemnation of this provision comes to the truth. No American citizen could reasonably take exception upon the ground that it remotely interferes with the fullest prerogatives of the American Government and the American Congress.

EXHIBIT B

[H.Doc. No. 319, 72d Cong., 1st sess.]

VETO MESSAGE RELATING TO THE TARIFF ACT, 1930

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning without my approval H.R. 6662, entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, and for other purposes."

My first objection to the bill is the misimpression and uncertainty it may convey as to its purpose. If the purpose of the proponents of this act is to secure lower tariffs on the 35 percent of our imports which are not on the free list, it would seem that the direct and simple method of so doing would be to recognize that tariffs are duties applied to particular commodities, and to propose definite reduction of the duties on such particular commodities as are believed to be at fault and upon which the full facts can be developed. Alternatively, the Congress is able to direct the Tariff Commission under the flexible provisions of the act of 1930 to act upon such schedules as are believed to be too high.

As a matter of fact, there never has been a time in the history of the United States when tariff protection was more essential to the welfare of the American people than at present. Prices have declined throughout the world, but to a far greater extent in other countries than in the United States. Manufacturers in foreign countries which have abandoned the gold standard are producing goods and paying for raw materials in depreciated currency. They may ship their goods into the United States with great detriment to the American producer and laborer because of the difference in the value of the money they pay for their raw materials and the money they receive for their finished products. Under such conditions it is imperative that the American protective policy be maintained. If the intent or the effect of the proposed bill is to remove the possibility of Executive action or to reduce tariff protection, there never was a time more inappropriate on account of wide-spread domestic unemployment and the possibilities which lie before us.

The second objection to the bill is that it practically destroys the flexible tariff through the removal of Executive authority to render conclusions of the Tariff Commission effective. This bill would again reduce the Tariff Commission to a purely advisory body to the Congress, and thus defeat a reform so earnestly sought ever since its first advocacy by President Roosevelt and finally fully realized in the Tariff Act of 1930. By the act of 1930 the principle of a flexible tariff based upon determinations by a bipartisan commission, subject to approval of the Executive, was firmly and effectively established. Beyond the ability to change the duties by 50 percent there lies within the provisions the development of the definite principle of preference of the home market for American industry, workmen, and agriculture, based upon the difference of cost of production at home and abroad, plus transportation to the principal markets. This open process, upon the application of any responsible party, is an assurance against either excessive duties or nonprotective tariffs upon dutiable goods.

The broad purpose of the present form of Executive action upon the "flexible" provision is promptly to remedy inequities and injustices in the tariff as they may be discovered; to prevent any tariff system being frozen upon the Nation despite economic shifts; and by providing this flexibility to meet changing economic conditions, greatly to lessen the necessity for periodic general revision of the tariff with its disturbance to economic life and its orgy of politics and logrolling. The flexible provision has, since the act of 1930, proved its high usefulness in these particulars. The Commission has completed or has in progress investigations covering 291 different articles. Of those which come under the flexible provisions, the recommendations were for no change in about 54 percent of the cases, increases in 16 percent, and decreases in 30 percent, which were placed in effect within a few days. This effective flexible tariff as a protection to sound progress and for the future protection of our farmers, workmen, industries, and consumers should be maintained in our American system. The proposal in the bill under consideration will effectively destroy it and is a step backward.

Under the present law the Congress has the benefit of the advisory functions of the Tariff Commission, upon which it can act at any time. If this bill is to have any practical result by reserving to the Congress incidental or occasional readjustment of the tariff, it simply opens the way for logrolling every time Congress is called upon to consider a report of the Tariff Commission recommending any specific change in rates or schedules. In an effort to avoid this obvious objection the act attempts to limit Congress, in legislating upon the recommendations of the Commission, to the specific items included in the report. But no Congress can bind another Congress in any such manner, relating as it does to a question of legislative procedure.

My third objection to the bill lies in the conditions stipulated for action in an international conference which it is proposed should be called to deal with trade questions. I wish to say at once that I am in fullest accord with the proposal for an international action or conference to "eliminate discriminatory and unfair trade practices", "preventing economic wars", and "promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations among nations." The American Government has participated in several international economic conferences for these identic purposes since the Great War. They have resulted in very little accomplishment.

But the objectives proposed in this bill for such a conference are not limited to the constructive purposes above mentioned. Some of the proposals in the bill for such a conference raise questions of futility or alternatively of abandonment of essential American policies. The first legislative act of Washington's administration was a tariff bill. From that day to this one of our firm national policies has been that tariffs are solely a domestic question in protection of our own people. It is now proposed that an international conference should be called with view to "lowering excessive tariffs." The very implication of calling other nations into conference with view to changing our tariff duties is to subject our tariffs to international agreement.

For myself I hold that any inequalities or excessive duties in the American tariff can be corrected through the flexible provisions of the present tariff law. If other nations should adopt this principle and such an instrumentality, it would automatically remove excessive duties and unequal treatment throughout the world without interference with domestic control of tariff policies.

If the meaning of the Congress is that such a conference should discover and negotiate the elimination of particular excessive duties throughout the world, then I do not need to elaborate upon the direction in which such action leads, for it means simply attempting the futility of negotiating a world tariff amongst 60 or 70 nations, subject to confirmation of their legislative bodies. If, on the other hand, what the Congress means is to undertake a general lowering of American tariffs in exchange for lowering of tariffs elsewhere in the world, and if the Congress proposes to make such a radical change in our historic policies by international negotiation affecting the whole of American tariffs, then it is the duty of the Congress to state so frankly and indicate the extent to which it is prepared to go.

I am fully alive to the effect on our own and world commerce of the many arbitrary restrictions now in existence. The Departments of State and Commerce are actively engaged in protecting our export trade from unfair discriminations and infractions. If at any time circumstances are such as to permit the hope that such barriers to international trade and commerce may be removed through the medium of an international conference without sacrificing American interests or departing from the historic policies followed by our country, I shall not hesitate to take the lead in calling such a conference.

If this measure is intended to do more than this, then the new policy should be clearly indicated for clarity to the American people and for the guidance and judgment of the Executive. An established national policy should not be changed by implication.

My fourth objection to the bill lies in the further request that I should "negotiate with foreign governments reciprocal trade agreements under a policy of mutual tariff concessions." The proposal is in direct conflict with the other proposal "to eliminate discriminatory tariffs; prevent economic wars; and promote fair, equal, and friendly trade", all of which latter are desirable.

A firmly established principle of the American tariff policy is the uniform and equal treatment of all nations without preferences, concessions, or discriminations (with the sole exception of certain concessions to Cuba). No reform is required in the United States in this matter, but we should have at once abandoned this principle when we enter upon reciprocal concessions with any other nation. That is at once unequal treatment to all other governments not parties thereto. That is the very breeding ground for trade wars. This type of preferential tariff agreement which exists abroad today is one of the primary causes of trade wars between other countries at the present moment.

It has been the policy of our Government for many years to advance most-favored-nation treaties with view to extinguishing these very processes, preferences, and trade frictions and to secure equal treatment to us by the other nations in all their tariff and economic arrangements. We have such treaties or Executive agreements with 31 nations. If we adopted this complete reversal of policies and now negotiated reciprocal tariff agreements, we should either under our most-favored-nation obligations need extend these rights to all nations having such treaties with us, or to denounce such treaties.

The struggle for special privileges by reciprocal agreements abroad has produced not only trade wars but has become the basis of political concessions and alliances which lead to international entanglements of the first order. These very processes are adding instability to the world today, and I am unwilling to enter upon any course which would result in the United States being involved in such complexities and such entanglements.

Of high importance to us also in consideration of these matters is that the principal interest of a majority of the 60 or 70 other nations which might be approached for mutual tariff concessions would be to reduce the American agricultural tariffs. No concessions otherwise than those related to agricultural products would be of any importance to those particular nations. The effect of such a shift in the basis of our agricultural tariffs would be to make us large importers of food products, to demoralize our agricultural industry and render us more and more dependent upon foreign countries for food supply; to drive our farmers into the towns and factories, and thus demoralize our whole national economic and social stability.

Moreover, the futility of the Executive negotiating such treaties as reciprocal tariffs has been often demonstrated in our past. Before we definitely adopted the policy of equal treatment to all nations, the Congress had from time to time authorized such treaties. Out of some 22 such treaties providing for reciprocal tariff concessions, the Congress either refused to confirm or failed to act in 16, and 2 of the remaining 6 failed of confirmation by other governments. On another occasion the Congress conferred upon the Executive a limited authority to conclude reciprocal or preferential tariffs without confirmation. Twenty-two such agreements were entered upon, all of which were repealed in subsequent tariff acts. The experience would not seem to be encouraging for this type of action.

There are other objections which might well be taken to this bill. It is enough, however, that this bill would destroy the effectiveness of the flexible tariff which for the first time gives protection against excessive or inadequate tariffs, prevents a system of frozen tariffs upon the country irrespective of economic change, and gives relief from logrolling and politics in tariff making. It would surrender our own control of an important part of our domestic affairs to the influence of other nations or alternatively would lead us into futilities in international negotiations. It would start our country upon the road of a system of preferential tariffs between nations with all the trade wars, international entanglements, etc., which our country has sought to avoid by extending equal treatment to all of them.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 11, 1932.

[H.R. 6662—Seventy-second Congress of the United States of America; at the first session, begun and held at the city of Washington on Monday, the 7th day of December 1931]

An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 336. Recommendations for adjustment of duties: (a) Upon the request of the President of the United States, or upon its own motion, or upon application of any interested party showing good and sufficient reason therefor, the Commission shall investigate and ascertain the differences in the costs of production of any domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article, whether or not actually imported into the United States. If the Commission finds it shown by the investigation that the duty imposed by law upon the foreign article does not equalize the differences in the cost of production of the domestic article and of the foreign article when produced in the principal competing country or countries, then the Commission shall report to the President and to the Congress such increases or decreases in the duty upon the foreign article as the Commission finds to be necessary in order to equalize such differences in the costs of production. Any such increased or decreased duty may include the transfer of the article from the dutiable list to the free list or from the free list to the dutiable list, a change in the form of duty, or a change in classification. The report shall be accompanied by a statement of the Commission setting forth the findings of the Commission with respect to the differences in cost of production, the elements of cost included in the cost of production of the respective articles as ascertained by the Commission, and any other matter deemed pertinent by the Commission.

"The President, upon receipt of any such report of the Commission, shall promptly transmit the report to the Congress with his recommendations, if any, with respect to the increase or decrease in duty proposed by the Commission.

"Any bill having for its object the carrying out, in whole or in part, of the recommendations made by the Commission in any such report shall not include any item not included in such report; and in the consideration of such bill, either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate, no amendment thereto shall be considered which is not germane to the items included in such report.

"(b) No report shall be made by the Commission under this section unless the determination of the Commission with respect thereto is reached after an investigation by the Commission during the course of which the Commission shall have held hearings and given reasonable public notice of such hearings, and reasonable opportunity for the parties interested to be present, produce evidence, and to be heard. The Commission is authorized to adopt such reasonable rules of procedure as may be necessary to execute its functions under this section.

"(c) In ascertaining the differences in costs of production under this section the Commission shall take into consideration, insofar as it finds them pertinent and practicable—

"(1) The differences in conditions of production, including wages in terms of labor cost per unit of product, costs of materials, and other items in cost of production of like or similar articles in the United States and in competing foreign countries;

"(2) Costs of transportation;

"(3) Other costs, including the cost of containers and coverings of whatever nature, and other charges and expenses incident to placing the article in condition, packed ready for delivery, storage costs in the principal market or markets of the United States and of the principal competing country or countries, and costs of reconditioning or repacking wherever incurred;

"(4) Differences between the domestic and foreign article in packing and containers, and in condition in which received in the principal markets of the United States;

"(5) Invoice prices or values and/or wholesale selling prices in the principal market or markets in the principal competing country or countries, insofar as such prices or values are indicative of cost of production, provided such costs cannot be satisfactorily obtained;

"(6) Advantages granted to a foreign producer by a foreign government or by a person, partnership, corporation, or association in a foreign country;

"(7) Any other advantages or disadvantages in competition which increase or decrease in a definitely determinable amount the total cost at which domestic or foreign articles may be delivered in the principal market or markets of the United States; and

"(8) Definition of costs of transportation: Costs of transportation for the purposes of this section shall be held to include, insofar as applicable, freight charges and all other charges incident to transportation, including transit insurance, costs of loading and unloading, and port charges and landing charges. These costs shall be computed from the principal producing areas (in the United States and in the principal competing country or countries) that can reasonably be expected to ship to the principal consuming region or regions of the United States and shall be computed to such principal market or markets of the United States as may most nearly insure equal competitive opportunity to domestic articles and like or similar foreign articles in such region or regions. If this purpose may be best accomplished thereby, such costs on domestic articles and on like or similar foreign articles shall be computed to different principal markets of the United States.

"(d) In determining costs of production in the United States and in the principal competing country or countries for the purposes of this section the Commission shall take into consideration the costs of production only of such establishments as are economically located and efficiently operated and shall obtain such costs for a normal and representative period.

"(e) In connection with its investigations as to differences in costs of production the Commission shall inquire into the following matters and shall include in each report pursuant to this section a summary of the facts with respect to such matters:

"(1) The efficiency and economic operation and location of the domestic industry under consideration;

"(2) The conditions of such domestic industry with respect to profits and losses, the extent to which productive capacity is utilized, and the extent of unemployment;

"(3) The extent to which adverse conditions of production may be due to foreign competition or to other specified factors;

"(4) The extent to which adverse conditions of production may be remedied by adjustments in the tariff law, taking into consideration the substitution of articles used for the same purposes as the articles under consideration, and taking into consideration any other pertinent competitive factors; and

"(5) The effects of any proposed increase or decrease in rates of duties on other domestic industries and on the export trade of the United States."

SEC. 2. All uncompleted investigations instituted prior to the approval of this act under section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 prior to its amendment by this act, including investigations in which the President has not proclaimed changes in classification or in basis of value or increases or decreases in rates of duty, shall be dismissed without prejudice; but the information and evidence secured by the Commission in any such investigation may be given due consideration in any investigation instituted under the provisions of section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended by this act.

SEC. 3. Consumers' counsel: (a) There shall be an office in the legislative branch of the Government to be known as the "office of the consumers' counsel of the United States Tariff Commission." The office shall be in charge of a counsel to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No person shall be eligible for appointment as counsel if such person has at any time acted in tariff matters before Congress or the United States Tariff Commission, either on his own behalf or as attorney, at law or in fact, or as legislative agent. The counsel shall be appointed for a term of 4 years and shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. The counsel shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as counsel.

(b) It shall be the duty of the counsel to appear in the interest of and represent the consuming public in any proceeding before the Commission. In any proceeding before the Commission in which the counsel has entered an appearance the counsel shall have the right to offer any relevant testimony and argument, oral or written, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses and parties to the proceeding, and shall have the right to have subpena or other process of the Commission issue in his behalf. Whenever the counsel finds that it is in the interest of the consuming public to have the Commission furnish any information at its command or conduct any investigation as to differences in costs of production or other matters within its authority, then the counsel shall so certify to the Commission, specifying in the certificate the information or investigation desired. Thereupon, the Commission shall promptly furnish to the counsel the information or promptly conduct the investigation and place the results thereof at the disposal of the counsel.

(c) Within the limitations of such appropriations as the Congress may from time to time provide the counsel is authorized (subject to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended) to appoint and fix the salaries of assistants and clerks, and is authorized to make such expenditure as may be necessary for the performance of the duties vested in him.

SEC. 4. International Economic Conference: That the President is respectfully requested to initiate a movement for an International Economic Conference with a view to (a) lowering excessive tariff duties and eliminating discriminatory and unfair-trade practices, and other economic barriers affecting international trade, (b) preventing retaliatory tariff measures and economic wars, and (c) promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations between nations; but with the understanding that any agreement, treaty, or arrangement which changes any tariff then in existence or in any way affects the revenue of the United States must first be approved by the Congress of the United States.

The President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested, at as early a date as may be convenient, to proceed to negotiate with foreign governments reciprocal trade agreements under a policy of mutual tariff concessions. Such agreements shall not become operative until Congress by law shall have approved them.

SEC. 5. Maintenance of competition among domestic producers and distributors: In effectuating the purpose of a tariff policy to encourage domestic industries by the imposition of duties upon imports from other countries it is also the purpose to protect domestic purchasers and consumers against the exaction of excessive or artificial prices in respect to any and all the articles, commodities, and things subject to such duties by the maintenance of full conditions of unrestrained competition among domestic producers and distributors. In order to assure the maintenance of such conditions of competition, any citizen of the United States or the consumers' counsel established in this act shall be entitled to file a complaint in the United States Customs Court alleging that such conditions of competition do not prevail with respect to the production, distribution, or sale of any such dutiable article or commodity and setting forth the facts and circumstances supporting the allegations in such complaint which shall be verified by the oath of the complainant or others.

Upon the filing of such complaint the said United States Customs Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the truth and merit of such complaint and shall immediately cause public notice to be given by publication in the Treasury Decisions of the Department of the Treasury and the Commerce Reports of the Department of Commerce to all persons and corporations or associations concerned in the domestic production, distribution, or sale of such article that it will hold a hearing on the questions of fact and law contained in such complaint upon a day to be named therein when relevant testimony and argument may be offered to determine whether such full conditions of domestic competition prevail and to what extent if any price-fixing agreements or practices, or production limiting agreements or practices obtain in the production, distribution, or sale of such article or commodity—and following such testimony and hearing the said court shall report its findings to the President.

Upon the receipt of such findings, if it be shown thereby that the full conditions of competition contemplated by this act do not prevail with respect to the dutiable article, commodity, or thing described in such complaint, then it shall be the duty of the President within 1 month to issue a proclamation suspending the imposition and collection of the duty or duties levied in this act upon such article, commodity, or thing and declaring such duty or duties inoperative until and unless it shall be established before such court, and such court shall make findings to the effect that the full conditions of competition aforesaid do prevail and shall report such findings to the President, who shall then proclaim a cessation of the suspension of such duty or duties.

The said court shall be governed by the preponderance of the evidence in making its findings and shall have power to make reasonable rules and regulations to govern its procedure in such cases: Provided, That nothing herein and no proceeding brought hereunder shall be held to weaken or otherwise adversely affect the laws of the United States applicable to conspiracies in restraint of trade or the enforcement thereof.

JNO. N. GARNER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GEO. H. MOSES,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

FOREIGN DEBTS AND RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I shall burden the Senate only for a very few minutes.

I am moved to a departure from the subject matter of the debate by reason of a statement sent to this Government which reaches it this morning from a source of some potency, and to a source of official property, in which the governments which are indebted to the United States are being spoken for by an envoy, who, noting that we have been for the past week debating a measure looking to the negotiation of treaties between our country and foreign lands for exchange of trade, asserts that the new proposition of the international debtors—of whom we may give curt descriptions, as illustrations, as England, France, and similar countries—tendering in their behalf a new payment and a promise of further payment, is being largely offered, and, to use the quotation, is wholly stimulated by the belief that under the system of exchange afforded by the treaty power which the pending legislation would give the President, opportunity will be given to the debtors to return to this country so much more of their products, for which so large a sum of profit may be obtained, that they will offset the amount of the debt that is being paid as a "token", or the sign of what we lawyers of the earlier practice called "earnest money", and as an indication of good faith.

Mr. President, I am not at all willing to believe that the statesmen of these eminent debtors have given their approval to such accusation, and I cannot for a moment concede that this, our country, will, under any conditions, encourage the hope of this meretricious mésalliance.

Mr. President, I have from time to time within, say, the past month, burdened the patience of this honorable body by calling attention to the changing form and varying phase of disposition on the part of our debtors: First, declining to pay us anything whatever; then the subsequent statement that one will declare itself in "default"; third, that another omits from its budget any reference whatever to the coming obligation, indicating no intention to treat it as one to be acknowledged. Finally, sir, a further statement that the point had been reached when a proposition would be made to America to "take it or leave it." If accepted, the situation is at an end. If declined, it will be treated as having wholly come to a conclusion by reason of our action in declining the offer made by the debtor.

Mr. President, there is before us that which we can recognize as the existing fact—the suggestion from the debtors that a payment will be made—as to one debtor, the payment that is now due; as to the other debtor, that a negotiation will be entered upon from which new terms may be expected and new conditions enjoyed. These, it is assumed, will enable the debtor to continue in the attitude of good faith as both a friend and a debtor.

Mr. President, I rise particularly to invite attention to the fact that in the different instances where I have burdened this honorable body by calling attention to these changes in the spirit of the debtor, this Senate in response ever replies by giving to the President our constant, unanimous support of his efforts to collect the debts of this country. We have let the debtors of Europe behold that there was no spirit in this body on either side of party alinement to encourage them in flouting this Nation. This Senate has displayed every spirit to indicate a legitimate form of retaliation if an unjust thing, commercially or industrially, should be attempted by any debtor upon the Nation of America.

I delight, sir, in this concluding observation to call attention now to the fact that these countries, having beheld the attitude of this honorable body, have concluded that the only step which America will permit, which it can approve, is one of good faith on the part of the debtors. Now that good faith is being again revived, let it be understood that the new situation is without any surrender or concession of any of the rights by the United States, and under no circumstances visiting any humiliation upon the debtor. But I urge upon this honorable body that we very early have it asserted, as we discuss the treaty power which we seek to give the President, that the President of the United States, as the servant of America and the protector of its interests, will under no circumstances gratify the wish from any source to allow any nation, debtor or otherwise, to take advantage of an opportunity to dump upon the shores of America the products of its own land under the guise of reciprocity. We will not allow any people to unjustly burden the commerce of America to its embarrassment, perchance to its destruction. While we will seek equity and a just distribution of favor, I trust it may soon be made clear that we will not tolerate, nor will we endure, either as a consideration for obtaining the money due us on the debt or for the mere exchange of what may be called fraternal relations, any form of commercial exchange or commercial undertaking that will reduce the business of America to a subordinate state, where it may be overcome by a rush of imports that violate the legitimate defense of America and overcome the just preservation of its merchants, its manufacturers, and its people.

With this very clear understanding, I trust we may be moved to carry out these treaties, when they shall be consummated, all in the proper spirit intended, as a legitimate exchange of rights between nations of equality; but under no circumstances is the United States to endure a wrong as an inducement for justice from other nations.

I thank the Senate for allowing me to express the viewpoint that I feel should at this time be urged, and I make bold myself to do so.

AMERICA'S FUTURE

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, last night a number of very notable addresses were made on the occasion of reopening the Century of Progress International Exposition at Chicago. Mr. W. R. Hearst sent to those present a short statement which I think everyone ought to read. In order that the statement may come to the attention of a larger number than those who are in the Chamber at this time, I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD, and I also ask that it may be read. It is very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CHICAGO, May 25.

I think the Century of Progress is ahead of us and not behind us.

The world has progressed consistently as the centuries have passed.

If it has not progressed in one place it has in another, and the sum total has spelled consistent progress.

There is no reason to believe that the human mind has reached the limit of its development, or that America has ceased to be the center of intellectual development and industrial progress.

There is consequently every reason to believe that this great Nation will go forward with greater and surer strides than ever before and that the beginning of the greatest era of progress is now—not at some distant date, not even on the morrow—but now.

We are already on our way.

We can be helped or hindered by governmental action, but nothing can prevent our progress.

Communism may confuse, fascism may complicate our situation.

A sounder financial program, a more flexible monetary system may stimulate recovery.

Extravagance of administration, unjust and excessive taxation may hamper it.

But nothing can preclude an immediate era of prosperity greater than we have ever known.

If I could have the pleasure of being with you this evening, I would offer a toast to what your great exhibition signifies and signalizes in my mind—

A toast to the Century of Progress ahead of us—a toast to the greatest country, to the greatest century, to the greatest progress in the history of the world.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I believe that short statement epitomizes the possibilities of our great country. Many of us in times of depression are apt to think that all the greatness is behind us, that the day of accomplishment is past.

Not long ago I enjoyed the opportunity of listening to a speculative utterance as to the possibilities of development in the field of science and discovery as suggested by Mr. Charles Kettering, one of the great scientists of the day. I have not yet received a copy of the remarks he made on the occasion when Mr. Hearst's address was delivered, but I heard him, and I hope the whole country will have the pleasure of reading what he said as to the possibilities of the future in the field of science.

Mr. President, the owner and publisher of the Toledo Blade is a progressive citizen of the country, and very ardently, at the outset, espoused the program of the new deal. He has come to the conclusion ,as expressed about 2 months ago, that, the program having been tried out, he has lost his former hope that it could eventuate into what the advocates of many of the proposals declared would be the result. He has just written an editorial, which appeared in the Toledo Blade, which indicates his present concern. The editorial was written in what might be called a form of irony, but it indicates how the American people are beginning to question just where we are going, and what is to be the actual result of all of these new fads and theories which are being adopted and put into operation.

I shall not ask that the editorial be inserted in the RECORD, but I take the opportunity now of reading it:

ELIMINATE THE WASHINGTON "DREAM WALKERS"

Some months ago two very successful composers wrote the lyrics and music of a new song, which, among other words, included:

"Did you ever see a dream walking?
Well, I did—
Did you ever hear a dream talking?
Well, I did—
Did you ever see a dream dancing?
Well, I did—
Did you ever see a dream romancing?
Well, I did." (Etc., etc., etc.)

The young men who wrote the song did it for entertainment and enjoyment, and the fact that it is being played and sung everywhere proves its great success.

Hearing this song recently brought to our mind some of the "dreamers" in Washington, the "brain-trust" dreamers who are trying to help President Roosevelt and his administration with their "romancing ideas."

You laughed at them first, until they became tragic. They often changed their dreams. When the "walking dream" did not work out they changed it to the "talking dream", and when that proved a myth they changed to "romancing dreams."

Someone should awaken them and hand them a one-way ticket for home, or, as the famous liberal thinker and writer, Mr. H. L. Mencken, recently stated: "Go back", he said, addressing these inexperienced dreamers, "go back to you college posts and teach the sophomores to be ashamed of their fathers."

We do not believe and never bave believed that President Roosevelt sympathizes with these "dream walkers", but unfortunately he has been too patient with them, and this has been harmful.

I stop the reading merely to repeat what I stated a moment ago, that Mr. Paul Block, the owner of a series of papers and the writer of this editorial, is and has been a great admirer of the President.

The writings and speeches of Professor Tugwell, now Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, are clearly socialistic if not communistic, and he should be asked to resign. "I shall roll up my sleeves—make America over", he once wrote. "The first series of changes will have to do with statutes, with constitutions, and with government", he stated in one of his speeches; and in his last book he wrote, "the next series of changes will have to do with industry itself. It has already been suggested that business will logically be required to disappear. This is not an overstatement for the sake of emphasis; it is literally meant."

Another "dream walker" is the young lawyer Jerome Frank, serving as general counsel of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, for whose removal a petition was sent last month to Congress by the 131 executives of the Dairy Cooperative Marketing Association, representing 44 States. "We demand the immediate removal of those persons in the Department of Agriculture who have so unequivocally demonstrated their inexperience, inability, inefficiency, and inaptitude in dealing with fundamental problems facing our dairy farmers, etc., etc." And so another "dream walker" is asked to step out so the farmers' problems will not be made more difficult.

There is the "dream romancer", Mr. James M. Landis, who, with Professor Frankfurter, has been credited with authorship of the securities law, which has prevented the flow of new capital into business and which act is now being rewritten, however, after much harm has already been done to business and employment.

Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale, a former member of the Washington "brain trust", after watching the young professors "dream walk", made the following statement: "The administration has gone too far toward the Russian way and not far enough or fast enough in the American direction. The stock-exchange bill threatens to go too far in the Russian direction. The Securities Act has gone too far in the Russian direction. The N.R.A., the P.W.A., C.W.A., A.A.A., and perhaps some others in our alphabet soup have gone too far in the Russian direction. The time has come to call a halt, and the American people are beginning to see it."

And now comes another "dream" committee, headed by the well-known Clarence Darrow, who, in his report on the review of the N.R.A., advocates socialized ownership and control of American industry with elimination of the profit system. Mr. Darrow's report includes constructive criticism of some N.R.A. codes, especially as it concerns small business, but he and his committee go much further and advise what is virtually the present Russian communistic system. We feel certain President Roosevelt will pay no attention to this report.

There are other "dream walkers" in Washington, many of them. One wonders where they all came from. Like a grasshopper plague they just appeared, and it is to be hoped that the same rain which drives away these plagues will be enough to also eliminate this "brain plague", before the voters next fall help to accomplish it.

Come Mr. President, come gentlemen of the Congress, cleanse the administration of ultra Socialists and Communists before it is too late. America does not want them. This is still the country of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln. A free America. A democratic America, where free speech, a free press, religious tolerance and freedom from dictatorship are desired.

I submit that editorial for the country to think over for a while.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, before making a motion which my authority here commands, I wish to join the Senator from Ohio in the commendation he paid to the statement of Mr. William R. Hearst.

I speak of Mr. Hearst as publisher. I do not agree with him politically at all times, and oftentimes we find ourselves at very great variance, I living in one of the cities where one of his very great papers is published, and oftentimes being forced, from my own convictions, to contest the views and attitude asserted by this eminent American from his convictions. But the speech made by Mr. Hearst to a banquet at the city of Chicago held in his honor the night before the appearance of the editorial which my eminent friend from Ohio brings to our attention, was another exhibition of a man of large wealth, large engagements, a great employer, disclosing complete confidence in the future of his country, refusing to enter upon doleful, dismal prophecies of danger and destruction. To the contrary, he points out the superiority in which his Nation is placed, and the sure future that awaits her people, both in prosperity in their business and great success and happiness in their careers.

For myself I would wish there were many other eminent publishers as this statesman-editor, Mr. Hearst, who could indulge a little more in imparting their countrymen confidence in their own Nation, and disclosing, upon the facts, how much there is to be confided to the honor and industry of our country. It is well that such patriots may speak often, and we trust they may do so for the benefit of America.

As to the latter editorial read by the able Senator from Ohio, we have seen that editorial reproduced in one form or another, in which much is said concerning what are called the "dream walkers."

I do not exactly understand all of this, but there is one thing I wish to deprecate. There seems to be a general disposition to discredit the young college gentlemen who are the employees of the Government in different branches—these who have come from college, educated, independent, who have no desire to make money from the Government, but are giving up their own chances of life, whatever they would undertake, and dedicating themselves to what they feel is a redemption from evil times and a reformation in the perverted institutions of the American Government.

Their viewpoint may be wrong compared with and measured by the viewpoint of some others, but to be constantly holding them up as unworthy of consideration merely because they are young collegiates, leaving college life to perform public service, and sending forth their views, such as they have drawn from their eminent, sage professors of older age in the institutions from which they come—holding them up as unworthy of their citizenship, and charging them with being in the engagement of a dismemberment of the Union. These are charged to be initiating policies which their sense of patriotism should wholly deprecate, and which are charged as being destructive of the Republic. Sirs, in my judgment, this impeachment is unjust to these well-meaning and now wrongly berated patriots of a valorous effort to protect their people and rescue their country.

While we may not agree with all the views of these eminent aides of our administration, and though we will differ with them, and while our legislation will take on color that shows that we deny them the wisdom they would indicate—ours born of an experience in government—theirs the expression of a theory, of belief—still, sir, we must not discourage all the young men of the schools of America, all the young men and women of the colleges of our land, from hoping on that they, too, can offer something to the affairs of the world to smooth it out from its present disorder. In the wisdom that they bring from their colleges they contribute their information to the lifting of their country from out of the distress in which it finds itself. In doing all this they tender what they feel to be the exhibition of their own patriotism, and to that extent they should be commended, and in nowise held up, as they have been in too many instances, as unworthy of association with intelligent mankind, nor to be scoffed as dreamers. All creators of reform were at the start of fulfillment dreamers. The fathers of our Revolution and the founders of our form of government were dreamers before they awoke to the shape and character of the new-molded United States of America. Only through the dreams could their industry persist, their sacrifice multiply, and their devotions contribute the fulfillment of the hope of liberty and the blessing of justice.

I trust there will be much less, sir, of what we have been observing and enduring. Particularly I refer now to those adjuncts and aides of every nature of effort who now contribute their lives and efforts to the aid of oppressed people and relief of an embarrassed government under an honest conviction that they are serving the Government to its betterment.

One other word, finally: I do not know to what the eminent editor alludes as to these "dream walkers", and the appropriation of the song of the clever song writer and littérateur who has written the production. I have from time to time been in public life, not altogether consecutively, Mr. President, for I live in an overwhelmingly Republican country, with their loveliest citizenship in the world, but they disclosed their excellent judgment at times in not trusting me twice in succession [laughter], so there is always an intermission between coming and going; yet I have seen the exhibition of dreams on the part of eminent and seasoned statesmen who have been long in service, as disclosed in their different attitudes of government; these who contended for propositions as widely varient from anything that common sense could ever have adopted as possibly could be conceived even in the genius of the ballad writer or the inspired conception of youth's enthusiasm. So whatever was meant by these "dream walkers", so far as I am concerned, I know of no era in government which has not produced them. We recall that it is from Dean Dugelow we have the text, "The toiler dies in a day, but the dreamer lives always." As to this particular substance which has been read by my eminent friend, it is, as the bard puts it in the words of Prospero in The Tempest—"such stuff as dreams are made on."

I trust that these who now appear throughout our country as engaged in some internecine strife may soon find it agreeable "in well-beseeming ranks to march one way", and that for America.

SENATE

MONDAY, MAY 28, 1934

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious Lord and Heavenly Father, Author of Peace and Lover of Concord, breathe into our souls the love of beauty, truth, and goodness that, all confusion and discord being removed, we may abide under the holy influence of Thy calm. Help us this day to remember that we are Thy children, in whom should dwell no fear save that of being faithless to our trust. So shall our tasks be willed, in hours of insight, by deep and fervent effort to perform the common round of duty which unfailing love demands within the circle of Thy sovereign will. We ask it in the name of Him whose human life was the supreme expression of self-subjecting love, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day, Saturday, May 26, when, on motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ORDER FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of morning business the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. We want to move to discharge the Finance Committee from the further consideration of House bill no. 1 this morning. Would agreeing to the request of the Senator from Arkansas disturb our position? This morning is the only opportunity we have had for some time to bring up that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that agreeing to the request would disturb the suggested motion, if that motion were in order; but the call of the calendar is in order anyway.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Louisiana, let me say that under the rule of the Senate the Senate will proceed to the call of the calendar under rule VIII in any event, unless the request submitted by me shall be granted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On any other day except Monday it would be in order to move to discharge the committee, but on Monday the Chair thinks it is not in order to move to discharge the committee. Rule VII provides that the calendar under rule VIII shall be called on Mondays, and this call shall begin at the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. LONG. On Monday, as I understand, I cannot move to discharge the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. Might I inquire, would there be any objection on the part of the Senator from Arkansas if we did this morning take up the matter, without any debate, to discharge the Committee on Finance from the further consideration of House bill no. 1?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I should object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas that at the conclusion of the routine morning business the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INVITATION TO REVIEW OF THE FLEET

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 25, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: Owing to the limited facilities on board the cruiser Louisville it has been impracticable to invite all the Members of the Senate to witness the review of the United States Fleet by the President on May 31.

It is my earnest desire that all Senators be given an opportunity to view any or all of the ships of the Fleet during their coming stay at New York from June 1 to June 17, and I am accordingly taking this opportunity to extend a most cordial invitation for them to do so.

In order that each Senator who may desire to visit the fleet will be accorded the proper facilities I have requested the Commander in Chief to issue courtesy cards to those who so desire. Should it be desired to visit any particular ship or ships the name or names should be given in the request.

Requests for courtesy cards should be addressed to the Commander in Chief United States Fleet, care Postmaster, New York City.

It will be greatly appreciated if the above information is promulgated to the Members of the Senate.

Sincerely yours,

CLAUDE A. SWANSON.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 25, 1934:

S. 3114. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of certain bridges in the State of Oregon; and

S. 3436. An act limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to counsel in certain proceedings against the Electro-Metallurgical Co., New-Kanawha Power Co., and the Union Carbide & Carbon Corporation.

On May 26, 1934:

S. 2042. An act to establish a department of physics at the United States Military Academy at West Point, N.Y.;

S. 2442. An act for the protection of the municipal water supply of the city of Salt Lake City, State of Utah;

S. 2794. An act to amend the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act with respect to rates of compensation, and for other purposes; and

S. 3355. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a memorial from J. Neilson Barry, secretary of the Historical Research Council, Portland, Oreg., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Mott resolution", requesting the President to issue a proclamation to honor the Jason Lee's Establishment of the First Permanent Settlement in Oregon, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from Albert E. Hayes, of Denver, Colo., praying an amendment to pending silver legislation providing for the remonetization of silver on a legal basis, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Council of the City of Dearborn, Mich., endorsing a resolution adopted by the Detroit section of the American Society of Civil Engineers, favoring the enactment of legislation to remove certain restrictions as set forth in section 304–A of the National Industrial Recovery Act, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

DIVERSION OF WATERS FROM PYMATUNING RESERVOIR

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred resolutions of the Town Council of the borough of Sharpsville, Pa., together with my acknowledgment of the same, protesting the diversion of the waters of the Pymatuning Reservoir into the Mahoning Valley of the State of Ohio. The State of Pennsylvania has appropriated several million dollars for the acquisition of lands at the site of the Pymatuning Reservoir and for the erection of the Pymatuning Dam. I believe that the diversion of this water is unwarranted.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the State of Pennsylvania has appropriated several millions of dollars for the acquisition of lands at the site of the Pymatuning Reservoir, and for the erection of the Pymatuning Dam, this for the primary purpose of supplying water to the industries of the lower Shenango Valley; and

Whereas a proposal has been made to divert the waters of the Pymatuning Reservoir into the Mahoning Valley in the State of Ohio for the purpose of feeding a proposal canal: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the burgess and town council of the borough of Sharpsville object to and oppose the diversion of the waters of the aforesaid Pymatuning Reservoir and in behalf of the people of the borough protest against the proposed diversion of the aforesaid waters; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Honorable Gifford Pinchot, Governor of the State of Pennsylvania; the Honorable David A. Reed, United States Senator; the Honorable James J. Davis, United States Senator; the Honorable T. C. Cochran, Representative in Congress from the Twentieth District of Pennsylvania; and to Alexander W. Davis, chairman of Pennsylvania Canal Board, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Ordained and enacted this 9th day of May 1934.

[SEAL] JOHN E. CLEARY,
President of Council.

Attest:

MAME K. ROBINS, Secretary.

Approved by me this 11th day of May 1934.

H. R. PARSONS, Burgess.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
May 24, 1934.

Mr. JOHN E. CLEARY,
Sharpsville, Pa.

DEAR MR. CLEARY: Please pardon my delay in acknowledging the resolution adopted by the council of Sharpsville. Needless to say, my interest is in protecting the natural resources of Pennsylvania, and I have repeatedly informed advocates of canal routes which extend beyond the borders of Pennsylvania that I could not see my way clear to approve the diversion of Pennsylvania water for the building and maintenance of a canal in another State if it would deprive Pennsylvania of her economic share of our national wealth.

Most cordially yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS.

PREVENTION OF LYNCHING

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I have here a memorial, and before presenting it wish to make a brief statement about it.

It has been reliably reported that at the White House press conference last week the President of the United States expressed his desire that the antilynching bill (S. 1978), which, with amendments, has been favorably reported to the Senate by the Judiciary Committee and is now on the Senate calendar, be voted on by Congress before its adjournment. Under such circumstances, the extraordinary and deserved popularity and leadership of President Roosevelt in all parts of America justify the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and myself, who are cosponsors of this measure, in appealing alike to the able Democratic and Republican leadership of the Senate to assist us in our reasonable request for affirmative action in line with this deliberate expression of the President in favor of a vote by Congress at this session on a fundamental measure, in which are involved law, order, justice, and humanity for millions of underprivileged citizens of this country.

Congress can ill-afford to adjourn without such action. The measure before us has been petitioned for and endorsed during the last few months by authorized spokesmen of organizations having memberships in this country totaling approximately 40,000,000 American citizens. Indeed, never in our history have protests against the anarchy of lynching risen to any comparable high level of popular conviction. Support for the proposed legislation is today neither partisan nor sectional. To the honor of the South, let it be recorded that since the introduction of the bill editorials in behalf of its enactment have appeared as widely in leading newspapers of the South as of the North, and that no utterances in behalf of it have been more sober, well-considered, or impressive than those of southern leaders, and, even more moving, of noble, home-loving southern women, who are determined to do what they can to erase the age-old stain on our flag and civilization caused through the denial by irresponsible mobs and riotous assemblages of trial by jury, due process, and the equal protection of our laws. All law-abiding Americans should cooperate with and acknowledge the debt of gratitude we owe to such wise, patriotic, and humane southern leadership.

About 75 years ago Abraham Lincoln denounced lynching as "dangerous in example and revolting to humanity." Sixteen years ago Woodrow Wilson appealed to "the Governors of all States, the law officers of every community, and, above all, the men and women in every community in the United States, all who revere America and wish to keep her name without stain or reproach, to cooperate, not passively but actively and watchfully to make an end of this disgraceful evil." Last December the present President of the United States, following California's shocking Governor-sanctioned tragedy, denounced lynching as "collective murder" and declared: "We do not excuse those in high places or in low who condone lynch law."

That declaration of President Roosevelt, followed by a message in which, in effect, he properly classified lynching with the merciless brutalities of kidnaping and other first-degree offenses against life, provided a wholesome stimulus to awaken public opinion, and during this session Congress has been deluged with expressions of sound popular judgment in favor of immediate and remedial Federal legislation.

It is not my intention at this hour to do more than stress the precedence which should be given to the President's immensely important suggestion. In support of it I hope to have read at the desk of the Senate certain significant resolutions adopted by the Woman's Missionary Council of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at Birmingham, Ala., in March of this year. In a letter of Mrs. Fitzgerald Sale Parker, recording secretary of that council, she affirms its representation of approximately 225,000 American women. As their church affiliations indicate, these women are the inheritors of the South's proudest traditions. By way of further preface to the resolutions it should be said that they definitely urge the approval of pending Federal antilynching legislation by this Congress. They recognize, of course, that if this action shall be taken we will have adopted a reasonable Federal legislative enactment directly tending to emancipate millions of Americans from needless and long-unlifting shadows of fear and horror.

We are faced by a problem which at last has become everybody's business because too long it has been nobody's business. And, fortunately, the legislative proposal for dealing with it is so temperate, unimpassioned, and impartial, that if passed, it may well be termed an enactment not to compel but to assist by simple and common-sense safeguards sound and law-abiding local public opinion in its efforts to control irresponsible lawlessness.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. I thought we were proceeding under the order of what is known as "routine morning business."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct; and if there is any objection to the Senator from Colorado proceeding, he may not proceed.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Oregon will interpose no objections. I am sure that the Senator did not hear my opening declaration that I would limit myself to a brief statement. I have nearly concluded.

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator will conclude in a few moments, I shall not interpose an objection.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, out of many petitions and memorials in my possession in support of the antilynching bill, I now request that the letter of transmittal and the historic resolutions of the Southern Methodists' Woman's Missionary Council, adopted in March of this year, be read to the Senate by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY COUNCIL,
METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH,
Nashville, Tenn., April 2, 1934.

Hon. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. COSTIGAN: I am handing you herewith the action concerning the Costigan-Wagner bill taken at the meeting of the Woman's Missionary Council in Birmingham, March 7–12. This organization represents approximately 225,000 women in the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

Yours very truly,

(Mrs. F. S.) L. P. PARKER.

Whereas lynching records show that for a period of 44 years (1889–1933) 3,781 persons have met death at the hands of cruel lynchers, and more appalling still only 12 of those guilty of participation in these mobs have been convicted; and

Whereas the weakness of the local courts in dealing with mobs, as shown in the above figures, inheres in their purely local character, giving little hope for delivering us from the terrible situation of mob violence and outlawry in which we find ourselves: Therefore be it

Resolved—

1. That we, the members of the Woman's Missionary Council in annual session at Birmingham, Ala., March 7–12, 1934, do hereby give our endorsement to the Costigan-Wagner bill, which seeks to stimulate local State governments to perform their duty in protecting life and property and which gives to the Federal Government the responsibility of apprehending and convicting persons guilty of mob murder in cases where local government has failed to perform its duty.

2. That a copy of this resolution be sent to the following: Hon. FREDERICK VAN NUYS, chairman of the Senate committee conducting the hearings on the bill; Hon. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN and Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER, who are sponsoring the bill in the Senate, and Hon. THOMAS F. FORD, who sponsors it in the House of Representatives.

3. That we urge missionary women throughout the church to communicate with their Senators and Representatives asking them to promote the passage of this bill.

Mrs. J. W. PERRY, President.
Mrs. FITZGERALD S. PARKER, Secretary.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, there have been few occasions in the history of our country when the serpent of mob rule has raised its ugly head and bared its cruel fangs more menacingly than during the past few months.

An unfortunate situation has developed during the past fortnight that must give solemn pause to every thoughtful, patriotic American and particularly to every man charged with the duty of safeguarding the life, liberty, and right to pursue happiness without unlawful molestation. I refer, of course, to the Congress of the United States, the supreme lawmaking tribunal of the country.

Is it not fitting and proper, Mr. President, in view of the appalling situation that has developed recently, that we should strike a blow at mob rule at this session while we may? With class and racial hatreds running rampant, I believe it is only fitting and proper that we should pass the bill referred to by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], which would go far toward wiping out the cruel, cowardly, un-Christian, and un-American crime of lynching which has for too long been a scourge to a great body of law-abiding and patriotic Americans. I refer to the members of the Negro race.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 117) authorizing the President of the United States to present the Distinguished Flying Cross to Emory B. Bronte, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1190) thereon.

Mr. ERICKSON, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 1503) to amend the act entitled "An act to create the California Debris Commission and regulate hydraulic mining in the State of California", approved March 1, 1893, as amended, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1191) thereon.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 3697) granting a pension to Mrs. Daniel Ojinca or Bobtail Bull (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. SHEPPARD, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1850) to establish a national military park to commemorate the campaign and Battles of Saratoga, in the State of New York, and it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

AMENDMENT TO PETROLEUM REGULATION BILL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3495) to regulate commerce in petroleum, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining and ordered to be printed.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS—AMENDMENT

Mr. STEIWER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FINANCING OF HOME CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR—AMENDMENT

Mr. BLACK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3603) to improve Nation-wide housing standards, provide employment and stimulate industry; to improve conditions with respect to home-mortgage financing, to prevent speculative excesses in new mortgage investment, and to eliminate the necessity for costly second-mortgage financing, by creating a system of mutual mortgage insurance and by making provision for the organization of additional institutions to handle home financing; to promote thrift and protect savings; to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act; to amend the Federal Reserve Act; and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION

Mr. DICKINSON submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 250), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed to investigate the Federal Radio Commission, the records, documents, and decisions thereof, and each of the personnel thereof, with particular reference to the conduct and deportment of the several members of the Commission while engaged in exercising judicial or quasi-judicial functions under the Radio Act of 1927, and with further reference to the fitness of said several members of the Commission to exercise judicial or quasi-judicial functions either as members of the Federal Radio Commission as now constituted or as members of any commission which may be hereafter established to take over its powers and duties.

The committee shall report to the Senate the results of its investigation, including such recommendations as it deems advisable.

For such purposes the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act at such times and places in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, whether or not the Senate is in session, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary.

LUCY R. GEHMAN

Mr. TOWNSEND submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 251), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Lucy R. Gehman, widow of William H. Gehman, late an employee in the folding room, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENT WITH COLOMBIA

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 247) submitted by Mr. HATFIELD on May 22, 1934, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is requested to transmit immediately to the Senate a copy of the reciprocal trade agreement between the Governments of the United States and Colombia, agreed upon and signed on December 15, 1933, relating to certain import duties, excise taxes, and prohibitions on importation affecting specified products of such countries.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—DAVID HUFFMAN

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, it was Ordered, That the papers filed with the bill (S. 44) granting a pension to David Huffman (73d Cong., 1st sess.) be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 195. An act respecting contracts of industrial life insurance in the District of Columbia;

S. 2508. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and the Attorney General of the United States, to make equitable adjustments of conflicting claims between the United States and other claimants of lands along the shores of the Potomac River, Anacostia River, and Rock Creek in the District of Columbia; and

S. 3257. An act to change the designation of Four-and-a-half Street S.W. to Fourth Street.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant, to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. VINSON, Mr. DREWRY, and Mr. BRITTEN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

SALOON CONDITIONS IN CHICAGO

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Dr. F. Scott McBride, general superintendent Antisaloon League of America, on the subject Old Chicago Saloon Plus Women Equals New Chicago Tavern.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OLD CHICAGO SALOON PLUS WOMEN EQUALS NEW CHICAGO TAVERN

In Chicago the Republican National Convention, less than 2 years ago, witnessed a demonstration against the eighteenth amendment and declared for a "proposed amendment" which would "safeguard our citizens everywhere from the return of the saloon and its attendant abuses." In Chicago, less than 2 years ago, during the Democratic National Convention, galleries packed with wets howled down every speaker who ventured to support prohibition, and the delegates overwhelmingly adopted the following resolution:

"We advocate the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. * * * We urge the enactment of such measures by the several States as will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision and control by the States."

In Chicago, less than 2 years ago, the nominee of the Democratic Party in his speech of acceptance delivered to the convention, declared, "We must rightly and morally prevent the return of the saloon."

Now Chicago, where the big drive for repeal started and where both major political parties pledged that the saloon must not come back, should present the Nation's most conspicuous example of a successful solution of the liquor problem. But what do we find? Despite all promises, the saloon is back in Chicago, worse, more vile, more degrading, more dangerous than ever before in the history of that city.

In Chicago may be viewed at one and the same time a century of progress in industry, the arts, and science, and a century of retrogression so far as the liquor problem is concerned. In Chicago, saloons are back not only in the Loop but throughout the residence districts of the city. In Chicago, saloons are once more the gathering places of drinking and drunken men, and with them now women, "good and bad", mingle at the bars and in the wine rooms. In Chicago saloons high-school girls and boys by the hundred every night, drinking and dancing, rush madly on the downward path. In Chicago saloons every day and night millions of dollars are spent for intoxicating liquors to enrich the brewers and distillers and impoverish the people.

The abhorrent conditions in the saloons of Chicago, the very city from which "no saloon" promises were broadcast throughout the Nation during the party conventions, were recently investigated by the Committee of Fifteen, one of the leading social-service organizations of the city, Charles E. Miner, executive director, accompanied by trained representatives of the Chicago Herald and Examiner and the Chicago American. Their reports, as published in the above newspapers (whose policies had been against prohibition), are so revolting that many of the details must be omitted. The following excerpts, however, indicate the failure of the wet forces to keep their promises that the saloon would not come back. They show not only that the saloon is back but that its evils under modern social conditions are infinitely worse than those against which the people rebelled when the eighteenth amendment was adopted. In the worst places during the worst days of the old saloon in Chicago conditions were not as bad as they are now shown to be by the following headlines and verbatim excerpts from the day-by-day newspaper reports.

[From the Chicago Herald and Examiner, Mar. 6, 1934]

"SHOCKING SALOON REVELS OF SCHOOL CHILDREN REVEALED—SURVEY BARES LAWLESS BARS

"Shocking evidence of how Chicago's high-school girls and boys—children ranging between 13 and 18 years of age—are being lured into depravity by saloonkeepers, who flagrantly violate the law by plying child patrons with liquor, has been * * * discovered during a fortnight's survey of the city's unregulated saloons * * *, orgies which outrivaled the debauches of Paris' notorious Quartier Latin. * * * Drunkenness and laxity of morals are common in the dimly lit back rooms of these saloons, many of which carry on their vicious trade in the very shadows of the city's schools.

"Graphic evidence of the wide-spread and tragic adolescent delinquency nurtured by liquor was gathered by a special camera. The Herald and Examiner, however, will not use these photographs. Publication of these pictures would instantly wreck young careers already threatened with ruin by the outlaw saloon."

"Lured into depravity by saloonkeepers" is one of the first things observed about the children who frequent the saloon which has returned to Chicago. Thus does the saloon "promote temperance" in the lives of the coming generation. Ask the parents of these Chicago children whether they still believe in the promise that the saloon must not return.

Continuing with the story on the same day, the Herald and Examiner says:

"YOUTHS AND GIRLS 'NECKING' AND STAGGERING—FALL TO FLOOR

"Sprawled on the floor and asleep at the long tables were a dozen young boys and nearly as many girls. Some were obviously 14 and 15 years old. The older ones were 17 and 18. These children were students of Lake View High School. * * * A score or more of couples were locked in tight embrace. Others staggered about the dance floor. A beer stein crashed against the wall. Fights broke out * * * the beer was still flowing.

"Here was a party, made up almost entirely of children, a revolting drunken orgy—a spectacle which epitomizes the vicious growth of juvenile delinquency furthered by greedy and unscrupulous saloonkeepers operating under a city administration which ignores the law and popular sentiment calling for regulation of liquor sales. * * *

"A Lake View senior is taking tickets at the door. * * * To the reporters he says: '* * * The high-school kids make up 90 percent of our parties. They pay the freight.' * * * Underneath the orchestra stage three boy bartenders brawl with patrons. * * * Young drunkards fight and push to reach the bar. * * * A member of the committee points to 10 kegs of beer—all they have for a party of school children. * * * 'How', ventures one reporter, 'can these youngsters finish the 10 kegs of beer?' 'They always manage to get rid of them', chuckled the girl (barmaid). 'They certainly can drink. We rent out the hall to a crowd of them almost every Friday and Saturday night.'

"A blond child of about 16 is dancing for the crowd at the bar. Her skirts are to her hips. She is very drunk. * * * There are four little girls with 'crying jags.' * * * Lots of these children can't take it. Girls have 'passed out', their heads in their escorts' laps. Boys have fallen asleep on the shoulders of their 'dates.' * * * They're raffling off a pint of bonded whisky for a dime a chance. * * * A 16-year-old girl screams with pleasure when she wins it."

This is how "temperance" is being promoted in Chicago under repeal. The saloon keepers, brewers, and distillers are making the profits, but the children "pay the freight."

The Chicago Herald and Examiner of March 7, 1934, reports:

"DARKENED BOOTHS LURE PUPILS TO SOUTH SIDE DRINKING DENS; CHILDREN IN TIPSY EMBRACE

"Lured by darkened drinking booths, by dimly lit dance floors, and the sensuous syncopation of hot-cha orchestras, by liquor prices within the average schoolboy's allowance, pupils of South Side high schools frequent saloons where bartenders flagrantly violate the law forbidding the sale of intoxicants to children. * * * Some of them were plainly intoxicated and their conversation centered on how drunk they had been the night before. * * * The reporters encountered two boys and a girl, the latter about 15, drinking at the bar. The barkeep was serving them straight whisky. * * * Like the Parnell, this saloon has no permit. Both operate in dry territory through court injunctions obtained January 31. * * * There were no booths, but the room was so dimly lighted that shadows gave the corners privacy for boys and girls who drunkenly fondled one another."

Quite as in the days of the old-time saloon, "bartenders flagrantly violate the law forbidding the sale of intoxicants to children", in Chicago and elsewhere.

[From the Chicago Herald and Examiner, Mar. 8, 1934]

"WEST SIDE PUPILS PACK DENS; CHILDREN REVEL IN DARKNESS; BRAG OF LIQUOR AS THEY FALL

"The Club Ritz is * * * in Berwyn, but its dark booths and the sensual temptations they offer draw girls and boys from Austin and west suburban high schools. * * * Gin fizzes and beer steins littered the tables. * * * The reporters returned, guided by two Austin students, 16 and 15. * * * The interior of this saloon is so dark that the reporters at first could not find their way to tables. It was late afternoon, and there were no other students in the place. But the waiter recognized the two girls as steady patrons. He carelessly pushed their school books aside and served them with gin bucks. * * * Drinking at tables were eight unescorted young girls."

This is how Chicago is heeding the solemn injunction to "safeguard our citizens everywhere from the return of the saloon and attendant abuses."

[From the Chicago Herald and Examiner, Mar. 9, 1934]

"NORTH SIDE PUPILS HOLD DEBAUCH AT BEACHVIEW GARDENS

"Students encountered in other dives had told them (the reporters) of the Beachview Gardens * * * and had described it is 'a joint where you can get away with anything.' * * * A dozen high-school couples, children from 15 to 17 years old, swayed unsteadily over the dimly lighted dance floor. * * * The music became wilder as the orchestra encouraged them. * * * The reporters wondered where the bouncer was. But the Beachview Gardens, first selling liquor to children, makes no attempt to curb them later. This accounts in part for the saloon's popularity. * * * A slender little girl of 15 had passed out at another table. * * * It was 2:30 in the morning, and the reporters were getting tired. * * * There was a dozen intoxicated children staggering about the floor, and some had passed out, sprawled over the tables. * * * Downstairs, under the pretentious awning, the reporters waited for a cab. About them hovered the colored doorman. 'Big night, sir,' he said. 'Guess all the boys and girls up there are happy by this time.'"

The same number of the Chicago Herald and Examiner contains a statement by Rev. Alice Phillips Aldrich, welfare superintendent of the Illinois Vigilance Association. She charges:

"Chicago's present-day saloons are causing delinquency among young girls to an extent never equaled even in the old days of segregated vice. I began my work here with girls back in 1910, when the vice districts were in full blast. * * * But there was nothing to compare with what Chicago today is tolerating, when young people of opposite sexes, often strangers to each other, drink openly until they no longer are responsible for their actions."

Dr. Aldrich has seen the actual results in her study of more than 400 delinquent girls and she declared emphatically that the saloons, with their "back rooms" and upstairs facilities, constitute "an alarming cause of immorality and delinquent girls not known before in the history of Chicago."

"We must rightly and morally prevent the return of the saloon," said the Democratic candidate for President to the convention in Chicago which nominated him. And yet, in less than 2 years, social workers in that city find moral conditions more intolerable and delinquency greater under the repeal saloon-tavern than even in the old days of the saloon.

[From the Chicago Herald and Examiner, Mar. 10, 1934]

"SCHOOLGIRLS PLAY HOOKEY IN 'TAVERN'; BOYS SUPPLY LIQUOR

"Their unsteady feet dancing blindly down the path to moral disintegration, hundreds of Chicago's unguarded school children are exposed to ruin because of the uncurbed greed of saloon keepers who, flaunting the law, seek their profits from boyish pockets. * * * Victims of liquor which shattered their inhibitions and aroused them emotionally, two girl students of Senn High School shared in a conversation which laid open the degradation into which they, and scores of other pupils, have fallen. * * * Most of the conversation is unprintable.

"Only a few blocks from the high school the playground runs wide open. * * * As he poured drinks for the girls the bartender asked if they were 'ditching classes again.' * * * They urged her (girl reporter) to accompany them on their date that evening. * * * The girls * * * telephoned their mothers they would not be at home that evening because they were going to friends' homes to study. First 'spot' to be visited was the Hoosegow saloon * * * where the pupils crowded into darkened booths. At other tables drunken youths shouted suggestive remarks at a child entertainer—a toe dancer. * * * The party moved on to a restaurant * * * where students find the 5-cent beer * * * within their means. A barmaid served several rounds of beer. She watched the boys half empty their steins, then 'spike' the beer with whisky. The boys had several straight whiskies from their bottle, and then more beer. * * * Everyone was getting pretty tipsy."

In the new saloon in Chicago little girl entertainers are employed, a novel way to protect youth from "the saloon and attendant abuses."

[From the Chicago Herald and Examiner, Mar. 11, 1934]

"POLICE LOOK ON AS GIRL, 14, REVELS IN PUPILS' RUM DEN

"Under the indecent drawings and vulgar wall decorations of the smoky dive known as 'Jack's Nut House', * * * a shabby, drunken little girl of 14 * * * staggered about the bawdily decorated room. * * * She was wheedling drinks from older topers. * * * She had been intoxicated so long, they explained, she was becoming a nuisance. * * * Her newly discovered friend was opening an acquaintanceship. He was middle-aged, well dressed, and quite drunk. * * * The bartender made no move to protect the child. Two men, later identified through their conversation as detectives from the Wabash Avenue station, looked straight ahead as they drank. But several customers voiced their protests in undertones. (The Nut House is not a place to complain too loudly.)"

This is how "complete supervision and control by the States" works in Chicago. As in the old days, the saloon controls politics and politicians, instead of being controlled by them.

The survey conducted for a month by the Chicago American and the Committee of Fifteen was purposely confined to residential areas—home and apartment neighborhoods such as Ravenswood, Englewood, South Shore, Edgewater, Hyde Park, Rogers Park, and Humboldt Park and their adjacent shopping centers. Night clubs, as such, the night-life sections of the city, and the Loop were deliberately neglected to study conditions in good home neighborhoods.

The Chicago American for March 5, 1934, says:

"YOUNG GIRLS, BOYS DISPORT AT ALL HOURS IN TAVERNS

"It is now a little after 1 a.m. Drinks of all kinds are being served over the bar. Almost all of the men at the bar are standing; the stools apparently are tacitly reserved for the women and girls present as a sort of new repeal-era etiquette. * * * A taxi deposits a red-headed girl in evening dress at the door. * * * A little later she is telling us: 'This is a real bright spot. The alderman's nephew runs it and the police are fixed. They can run the joint as they please.'"

The investigators define the new "tavern" as "a cross between and old-fashioned saloon and a speak-easy." The speak-easy atmosphere is apparent immediately after 1 a.m., 4 out of 5 of the more than 700 taverns visited evading or openly flouting the 1-o'clock closing law. Apparently the only ones that close at 1 a.m. are the places in which there are no customers at that hour.

[From the Chicago American, Mar. 6, 1934]

"OLD SALOON PLUS WOMEN EQUALS NEW TAVERN

"Ten saloons in one block—the Barbary coast in the '90s. Ten 'taverns' in one block—Chicago, 1934! And this is not down around Twenty-second Street, not down around the near North Side, noted for its 'hot spots' and night-life rendezvous, but in one of the supposedly nicer residential sections of the city—Rogers Park!

"According to Charles E. Miner, executive director of the Committee of Fifteen, 'There is only one change, and that not for the better.' * * * Women! The old saloon plus women equals the new 'tavern.' Women at the bars! Women in the barrooms at tables! * * * Good women and bad women, schoolgirls and prostitutes, all mingled together indiscriminately, rubbing shoulders in this amazing sequel to the old-time saloon—the 'tavern.' * * * Something like 8,000 'taverns' exist. They have spread into all districts, into areas that never before have known the immediate proximity of a saloon. * * * And they are, indeed, many of them, true red lights. * * *

HOW WOMEN ADD "RESPECTABILITY"

"At that table over there is a young girl—surely not more than 19 or 20—slopping all over the table, while her companions urge her not to 'pass out and spoil the party.' * * * One of the girls at the bar slips sideways on her stool and falls backward, flat on the floor. * * * The boy friend goes back for another drink, and another, and a couple more. With each drink he becomes louder, noisier, more obstreperous. Finally, the bartender orders him out. He refuses, and the bartender comes from behind the bar. Out goes the obstreperous one, wham, into the street. You've seen it done in the movies, but you hardly expect to find it being done in the respectable neighborhood of upper Edgewater.

"A block away * * * is the 'Silver Slipper.' Two hostesses 'double in brass' as waitresses, dancing with patrons and also waiting on table. * * * We find the front lights dimmed and the barstools piled up on the bar after the legal closing hour. But the orchestra still is going full blast, tables are full, and we have no difficulty in obtaining drinks. Liquor is served to us in white, translucent glasses instead of the 'regular' kind, and for a moment we are transported back to the old speak-easy times."

Mayor Kelly, of Chicago, was reported in the Chicago Tribune of December 19, 1933, as saying:

"In my opinion, the presence of women will add respectability to the premises handling liquor."

Experience of only a few weeks with the new saloon in Chicago evidently partially opened the mayor's eyes. He still does not oppose women in saloons, but believes that if they will sit at tables the situation will be improved. The Chicago Tribune of December 30, 1933, quotes him as saying:

"After a few weeks of noting the general effect of women drinking at counters, I am convinced that people generally regard it as an obnoxious practice. * * * Women at counters just don't seem to mix. * * * If women want to drink, they can do it just as well * * * sitting down at a table as standing up or sitting on a high chair at a counter, the latter seeming to promote less feminine reserve and more roughness and loose talk—to the disgrace of women in general. I do not know anything that will stir up public opinion against personal liberty as far as liquor is concerned more than the regular sight of women drinking and carousing at tavern counters."

It is interesting to note that it is the standing or sitting position of the drinker which agitates the saloon apologist; never the thing that makes the saloon the menace it was and is—liquor. Whether there are screens and bars, or tables, seems to them the important thing, not that an intoxicating, narcotic, habit-forming poison is there dispensed.

"GIRL MAKES WINDOW OF TAVERN STAGE FOR SEDUCTIVE DANCE

"A woman dancing in a 'tavern' window * * *. A dimly lighted dance floor at the rear of a 'tavern' where silent couples twist and writhe in drunken rhythm * * *. Young men and women, some of them mere boys and girls, dropping in for casual drinks and even more casual 'necking' in 'taverns' in their home neighborhoods.

"Investigators' reports disclose that in virtually all of the neighborhood business centers of the city the new, low-licensed 'taverns' are regarded by neighborhood business men as actively menacing the welfare of established and well-regarded amusement places.

"Many a young girl, the Committee of Fifteen's investigator tells us, starts out for a perfectly respectable evening at a reputable place * * * and winds up at a 'tavern' where everything is free and easy. * * * Reputable places, we are told, do everything in their power to discourage 'pick-ups' and the presence of undesirables, but where 'pick-ups' occur on the street even before the girl reaches her originally intended destination the managements are helpless.

"TAVERNS REPLACE OLD 'SPEAK-EASIES'

"Throughout the West Side we find open 'taverns' where formerly there were known speak-easies. * * * The only difference is that now they are running wide open, where formerly there was necessity of camouflage. Throughout the place men and women are mingling freely. We find no introductions necessary, nor any need to take the initiative."

The saloon has, indeed, been brought "into the open" and it is found to be as competent as ever in evading and ignoring the laws made to control it and to be even more disreputable than the speak-easy it was to displace but has succeeded only in supplementing.

[From the Chicago American, Mar. 9, 1934]

"PHONE CALLS BRING IN GIRLS FOR VISITORS IN HOME AREAS

"Upstairs rooms, hidden peepholes, concealed basement bars, and above all the ever-ready telephone—women for sale! This is what the unsupervised, irresponsible 'tavern' has brought into the home neighborhoods of Chicago!

"The telephone, we have discovered in the course of our survey, is one of the most important pieces of equipment in these hot-spot 'taverns.' They form the direct connecting link between the 'tavern' and the homes of the neighborhoods in which these 'taverns' are located. Many a young woman who tells her parents or other relatives with whom she is living that she is going out to meet a girl friend is in reality going to keep a 'date' made for her via one of these 'tavern's' telephone messages."

HIDDEN BARS

"We are led through a barroom with the usual bar and booths lining the wall, back through the kitchen, and down into the basement. Here is a basement bar, concealed from prying eyes, in which a half dozen couples locked in close embrace dance to the music of two Hawaiian guitars. We count all of 15 'drunks' in this place—7 men and 8 women and girls. Two of the girls appear to be no more than 17 or 18. * * * Upstairs, as we came in from the street, we passed a police sergeant in uniform. * * * With him was a man in civilian clothes, whom the Committee of Fifteen's investigator recognized as a detective. It is after the 1 o'clock legal closing time, but the sergeant and the plainclothesman apparently have no watches. They are laughing and talking, and apparently enjoying themselves hugely. At 2:45 a.m. we leave. The sergeant and the plainclothesman have departed, and a doortender lets us out the kitchen door after first making sure that all is clear through a concealed peephole."

Following the exposé of conditions in Chicago, William F. Ogburn, professor of sociology and director of the social trends committee at the University of Chicago, said (Chicago American, Mar. 9, 1934):

SALOON IN "MODERN GUISE"

"Control over our younger people has been weakening ever since the advent of the 'jazz age', and now, finally this laxity has found its outlet in the new, unsupervised 'tavern.' Whereas the youngest customer the old-time saloon ever encountered was the youth at least in his early twenties, we find irresponsible 'taverns' of today patronized by young people, boys and girls alike, in their teens. * * *

"In my opinion, the close alliance of politics with these new 'taverns' is inevitable. The 'tavern' will become the meeting place of politicians, the trading place for votes around election time. This in itself is a sufficient evil, but drinking by women and young people at 'tavern' bars and tables is a blight upon our Nation."

Anton J. Carlson, widely known head of the University of Chicago's department of physiology, declared (Chicago American, Mar. 9, 1934):

"Today's 'taverns' rapidly are becoming worse than the old-time saloon. The saloon, at least, with all its abuses, did not encourage the presence of women and young people."

In Chicago, where the repeal movement gained its greatest momentum in the national party conventions and where the most solemn promises of "no saloon" were made, we have in less than 2 years' time the tragic demonstration of the complete failure of so-called "true temperance" and "liquor control." Is more proof needed to indicate what will happen wherever the wet forces capture control of the Government? Has not enough of the wet plan already been revealed to warrant the people in States which still have prohibition laws to devote their utmost efforts and diligence to a defense of these laws? Will they meekly surrender to the ruthless greed of the liquor traffic, which will not rest until the modern saloon prevails everywhere, in residence districts as well as business sections, and catering to children and women as well as to men?

Certainly now is the time for the Anti-Saloon League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and all other antiliquor agencies to fight the new saloon as vigorously and relentlessly as they did the old saloon.

Certainly the good men and women of America will not stand idly by while the modern saloon, which they were promised should not come back, destroys the bodies and souls of thousands of boys and girls in every city which has liquor control—control by liquor. Will the people in the States still dry rely on political promises that will not be kept, or will they rely on the ballot cast for prohibition, the only protection against the saloon?

POLICIES OF THE ADMINISTRATION—ADDRESS BY ARTHUR M. HYDE

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered by Hon. Arthur M. Hyde, former Secretary of Agriculture, on the subject of the policies of the present administration. The address was delivered before the Missouri Republican Club of Kansas City on the evening of May 25, 1934.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is not a new era. It is only another depression. The fundamentals of human relationships still remain true. The laws of economics and of morality have not been repealed. The institutions of political and economic liberty have not been outmoded.

The hard-learned lessons of 10,000 years of human experience are as valid as ever. What we suffer today had its origin in what we did yesterday. We shall reap in satisfactions or in sorrow a logical crop from the seed we sow today. Men have tried to beat every depression in history by artifice, by legerdemain, by great schemes of statecraft. They have always failed. They always will fail. We cannot get something for nothing.

Nobody quarrels with practical experiment. America, for 150 years, has experimented. But sane experimentation does not mean trying all the old mistakes over again; it does not mean defying known laws of economics; it does not mean revolution and the destruction of social institutions. It does mean trying to meet problems by experiments which are in harmony with the facts of experience, the laws of economics, and demonstrated principles.

Do you think that America, which has enjoyed the widest diffusion of wealth that the world has ever known, should experiment with the Russian plan, which produces the lowest standard of living in the civilized world?

Does anyone believe that the structure of recovery can be built upon such foundations as an unbalanced budget, rubber dollars, staggering expenditures, and a chaotic public policy?

Neither men nor governments can squander themselves into prosperity or borrow themselves out of debt. The other side of waste is want. There is nothing experimental about that. The inevitable result of reckless spending is more debt and burdensome taxes. This year government in the United States has spent an amount equal to 42 percent of the national income. If the Government takes in taxes one-fourth of the national income next year in taxes, that means that the people must work one-fourth of their time for the Government. Neither men nor governments can eat next year's seed corn without foreclosing the hope of next year's crop.

Somebody must pay. Somebody must pay the processing taxes levied upon bread and meat and clothing. They will amount, we are told, to $1,800,000,000 for the first 2 years. Somebody must pay the mounting deficit. Somebody must pay for the $10,000,000,000 program. Somebody must pay for manicuring the nails of the inmates of southern hospitals, for cleaning up rural fence rows, for hiring artists to paint murals, for catching rats in Brooklyn, for the army of bureaucrats scattered through every county in America drawing money which was appropriated for the relief of the needy.

Somebody must pay these huge sums, these mounting deficits. The Government has no funds except those it collects from its citizens by taxation. Who pays? The consumer pays. Sometimes he pays directly in taxes; sometimes he pays indirectly in the price of what he buys. But always the consumer pays, because the consumer is all of us.

Debasing the currency has been frequently attempted. The ancient form of the new deal was coin clipping. One of the crimes of ancient kings consisted in calling in the coinage and clipping pieces of metal off for their own profit. The difference between devaluing the dollar under the new deal and the pilfering of kings is that the new deal locks up all the metal and no king ever dared to take 41 percent of the value. Such is the ancient lineage of the currency-debasement part of the new deal, and such is the source of the $2,800,000,000 profit of which the new deal boasts.

You cannot make more milk by reducing the size of a quart cup. Neither can you make more money by reducing the contents of a dollar. Money is merely a measuring device, a medium of exchange. If it is to function as a medium of exchange, it must have value. People will not always exchange 100 cents' worth of work for 50 cents worth of money. They are doing it now only because no man now living can remember a time prior to a year ago when a dollar was not worth 100 cents. Decades of honest money have given people confidence. The full effect of devaluation is yet to come.

But, say the inflationists, suppose the Government does debase the dollar; suppose it does try printing-press money; nobody is hurt except the rich. Let us see about that. Debasement of the dollar means that the dollar will not buy as much as formerly. Debasement reduces the value and the purchasing power, not only of coins and currency but equally it reduces the value of every obligation payable in dollars. That means that the purchasing power of wages, of salaries, of every insurance policy, every bank account, every building-and-loan certificate, every Liberty bond is reduced. That means they will not buy as much food and clothing. Already the dollar will not buy what it did. Wages will not buy as much. Since April 1933 the average weekly income in the United States has risen 7½ percent, food costs have increased 17 percent, clothing 27½ percent.

Who owns the mortgages and Liberty bonds? Banks, insurance companies, savings institutions. They bought the mortgages and bonds with the money of their depositors, their policyholders. If the Government pays the bonds in a debased dollar, the banks and insurance companies must pay in debased dollars, and the hundreds of thousands of savings depositors must take their pay in debased dollars. Who owns the savings accounts, the insurance policies? Widows, orphans, white-collar workers, school teachers, the frugal and the thrifty of all classes who have sought to protect their old age or to give their children an education by putting their scanty savings into that security which until March 4, 1933, was the safest investment on earth. If the Government pays its bonds in debased currency, and if borrowers pay their mortgages in debased currency, then insurance companies must pay widows and orphans in debased currency. Any program which takes half of the value of the widow's insurance policy, of the worker's wage, of the small investments of the thrifty, is a dishonest program. That goes even if it does soak the rich. There are only a few millionaires. There are millions of holders of insurance policies and savings accounts.

If we inflate, who suffers? Everybody suffers, rich as well as poor, poor as well as rich; but mostly the poor suffer, because they are least able to protect themselves. The history of inflation in France, in Germany, in Russia, everywhere, has been the ultimate bankruptcy of the great middle class. Only the speculator profits.

The subject of rubber dollars and printing-press money is vastly cluttered and confused, but mark this down: Neither men nor governments can print value on pieces of paper. If they could, mankind would have been living for centuries without any work except running printing presses. We cannot get something for nothing. Such a program will hurt the rich; it will ruin the poor. Where it soaks one rich man, it will destroy a thousand small savers. It is morally indefensible. Nor is there justification for it in the fact that a few great financiers were crooked. That fact would not justify the great Government of the United States in following their example. The Government reaches thousands of small savers who never wander into Wall Street. No matter how great the economic emergency the moral guilt is the same. The laws of morality, like the laws of gravitation, operate all the time regardless of economic emergencies.

A little more than 150 years ago our forefathers declared that "all men * * * are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"; that "to secure these rights governments are instituted among men." In these words lie the distinctive characteristic of the American system of government. The Bill of Rights contains specific definition of the rights of the individual; the Constitution sets up a form of government to defend those rights. The Government so set up was to possess only such powers as the people ceded to it; the individual possesses God-given inalienable rights which not even the Government can infringe or abrogate.

This ideal was a denial of all former ideas of the State. It was a denial of the divine right of kings to control the property, to regiment the lives, or to dictate the means and methods by which the individual should earn his living or pursue his happiness. It was a denial of dictatorships in any form. It still stands as a denial of dictatorships, whether nazi-ism, fascism, socialism, or communism. The new deal, in common with all these forms of dictatorship, is based on the idea that the state, in order to compel economic good, has the right, if not the duty, to regiment the lives, to control the industries, and to restrict the liberties of its citizens. All such isms regard the state as absolute; the individual has only such rights and liberties as the state concedes to him. Americanism, alone among isms, endows the individual with the right to pursue his life, liberty, and happiness in his own way, with rights which not even the state may infringe.

Between these two conceptions lies a gulf as wide as the poles. For thousands of years the world experimented with kings, tyrants, and dictators, with the absolute state. In America liberty was enshrined, kings were rejected, the individual was exalted.

Two thousand years ago there came the Man, who said: "The truth shall make you free." Free—not rich—that was the promise.

The centuries have waxed and waned, economic tides have come and gone, kings have risen and fallen, but the stream of life has never ceased its unending quest to be free. Kings and emperors have enslaved large sections of the stream of humanity, dictators have regimented it, tyrants have divided it into stagnant pools, but they have never completely stopped its upward surge. In the American system of constitutional government, guaranteeing the citizen his unalienable rights, mankind has found the answer to that 2,000-year-old promise—freedom. In the 150 years since that happy event, this old world, released from tyranny, watered by individual liberty, revivified by the initiative of millions of freemen working in their own way for themselves and their children, has produced more of human happiness and has made greater progress in art, science, education, and economic prosperity than in all the previous centuries of experimentation with state control and regimentation put together.

Fifteen months ago there was a change of administrations at Washington. The old administration had kept the American faith.

The Constitution had been upheld as the unchallenged basic law of the land. American courts had been kept free, independent, and untrammeled. The rights of the States were unimpaired by any act of the Federal Government. The legislative branch of the Government was in full possession of its independent powers. The dollar of the United States was the one unimpeachable standard of value throughout the world. The bonds of the United States were the honorable obligations of a nation which had never up to that time repudiated a just debt or dishonored a national promise. The Government still adhered to the faith that all men "are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Freedom of speech, of the press, of religion were held to be inviolable. The Government had not attempted to infringe upon them or abrogate them. The outgoing administration handed over to the new, unsullied, the ideal of a free people—a government of laws, not of men.

Today not one of those ideals and institutions which were committed to Mr. Roosevelt is unqualifiedly secure, inviolate.

Far-reaching changes have been made in our social, economic, and political institutions. Under the whip of Executive urging, Congress has granted to the President revolutionary and dictatorial powers. These grants have not been made in carefully limited and clearly defined acts but are grants in bulk of powers heretofore reserved by the Constitution for the representative of the people in Congress. Authority has been granted for the debasement of our currency, the repudiation of national obligations, and for a Government-controlled and Government-directed system of economics and finance which is alien to American ideals, traditions, and institutions. Power to levy taxes has been vested in an appointive official. Power to legislate rules and regulations of far-reaching character has been granted to appointive boards and bureaus. For months those high in the administration have been telling us that this program constitutes a great but bloodless revolution.

Through it all Republicans have withheld merely captious criticism. We were told at the beginning that relief from economic distress, not reform, was the objective. There is no reform worthy of the American people which cannot be made within the limits of the American system. Republicans have stifled their fears in the hope that somehow the new deal might, as an emergency program, and without overturning American institutions, prove beneficial to the country. Now, however, Mr. Roosevelt himself tells us that the purpose of the new deal is no longer relief, but reorganization, that its objective "was not only to bring back prosperity. It was far deeper than that. The reorganization must be made permanent for all the 'rest of our lives.'"

For good or for evil there is a vast gulf between emergency relief and permanent revolutionary reorganization. It has probably been the part of patriotism to acquiesce in any temporary measure for relief. It is the imperative duty of patriotism to challenge such programs of reorganization as propose permanent revolutionary changes in our social, political, or industrial institutions. Changes of which, to quote again Mr. Roosevelt's own words, "only one thing is certain. We are not going back to the old conditions or to the old methods."

Thus, in 1 short year, sweeping powers which were obtained as emergency measures, which were based upon the economic emergency which were constitutional, if constitutional at all, solely because of the emergency, and which were to expire with the emergency are now demanded as permanent.

Today, for the first time, American institutions and American liberties are in need of defense against a national administration. This is the challenge of the hour. This is the call to arms to the Republican Party.

What were the old conditions and the old system at which the administration sneers? What was the old system, the American system, which had been slowly built up over 150 years of unparalleled progress? Its inspiration was the Declaration of Independence. The legal and political base of that old system was the Constitution, not merely as a legalistic document but as a covenant among freemen to respect and to maintain their mutual rights. The spiritual and moral base of that system was the Bill of Rights with its guaranty of freedom of speech and freedom of religion; the right of private property and the inviolability of the home; individual liberty of action, not as a license to do wrong but as a stimulus to individual initiative for personal achievement and national progress.

Under that system the struggle never has ceased and, so long as men are free, never will cease to eradicate the evils and to curb the abuses, whether financial, economic, or criminal, which human selfishness always imports into any system. Under that system we cannot say that we had attained perfect justice in all our social, political, or industrial institutions, but we can confidently say that no nation in history had ever attained for its people a broader liberty or a more equal opportunity. We cannot say that under that system we had achieved a utopia in which all men dwelt together in peace, plenty, and happiness; but we can say that in no nation upon which the sun ever shone had the average man enjoyed a higher standard of living, a broader distribution of the good things of life, been better fed, better clothed or better housed, had the way opened for him to climb as high and advance as far as his industry and his abilities could achieve. Call the roll of the Nation's great, of business and industrial leaders, of clergymen and professional men; they are not the product of an aristocratic wealthy class; they are sprung from the people.

Mr. Roosevelt describes the old conditions as "ruthless self-seeking, reckless greed and economic anarchy." Sneers at the America of yesterday and of her institutions are sown thick in the speeches not only of Mr. Roosevelt but of the professorial secretariat upon which he relies. Mr. Wallace demands to know if we want to go back to the "vomit of capitalism." Dr. Tugwell refers to "the unreasoning, almost hysterical, attachment of certain Americans to the Constitution." Dr. Moley sneeringly brands as hypocritical "any expression of devotion to our traditional liberties." Mr. Roosevelt says that "for a number of years in our country the machinery of democracy had failed to function." He describes his program as a "struggle against ruthless self-seeking, reckless greed and economic anarchy."

Dr. Tugwell recently addressed the students at Oberlin College. He called upon them to help liberate "the American people from the deadweight of outworn ideas and obsolete institutions." This description of America is a typical "brain trust" brainstorm, indulged by all and sundry from Mr. Roosevelt up or down.

Whence came the great college of Oberlin? Obviously from the life of America, burdened as it is with "outworn ideas and obsolete institutions." More specifically from men who wanted to establish a broader opportunity and a wider liberty for their children? Still more concretely, Oberlin was and is one of the products of capitalism. Whence came the audience which Dr. Tugwell addressed? They are the sons and daughters of men who used their own rugged individualism (hated words) to create for themselves better conditions, to send their children to school, to create for others better conditions of living, and so forth, ad infinitum.

Under the "deadweight of outworn ideas and obsolete institutions" there are more such audiences sprung from capitalistic daddies in colleges in America than in any other nation on earth. Dr. Tugwell never though of that. That is characteristic. The mind of the "brain trust" is of that myopic, microscopic type that it can see a speck on an apple at 100 yards, but it will never see the apple.

The Bible furnishes an excellent example of an early attempt at communism. Filled with zeal and brotherhood, the early church at Jerusalem decided to go Communist. To quote: "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart * * * they had all things common" (Acts 4 : 32). "For as many as were possessors of land or houses sold them and brought the prices * * * and laid them down at the apostles' feet, and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need" (Acts 4 : 34–35).

A noted character known as "Ananias" "sold a possession" but "kept back part of the price" (Acts 5 : 1–2).

Thus the Bible recounts the first new deal, and thus Ananias became the first chiseler.

Little more is said of this early experiment in communism. The Bible quaintly dismisses the subject with the remark that the church at Antioch, viewing from a safe distance the communistic experiment of the church at Jerusalem "every man according to his ability determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea, which also they did * * * by the hands of Barnabas and Saul" (Acts 11 : 29–30).

Thus the first N.R.A. wound up on the relief rolls. Thereupon the Bible drops the subject—so do I, except to remark that the church at Antioch, which was still a going concern, was no commune, but devoted rather to rugged individualism, because they sent relief "every man according to his ability."

No one of the "brain trust", however, has faced the facts more frankly or stated the issue more candidly than Donald Richberg, general counsel of the N.R.A.

"There are only two alternatives which can be presented by those who cry 'Scrap the N.R.A.' The first is to scrap all effort at a planned economic recovery * * * to return to the law of the jungle and to let the most ruthless and selfish of our breed survive. * * * The second alternative is to establish a new government endowed with power to own and operate all essential enterprises, free from any obligation to preserve individual liberty of action or individual rights of property."

Boiled down, if N.R.A. fails, there are only two paths left to travel. One is to do what Mr. Roosevelt says is the only thing we will never do, and that is to return to old conditions and old methods which he describes in words curiously paralleled to Mr. Richberg's as "ruthless self-seeking, reckless greed, and economic anarchy." The only alternative again quoting Mr. Richberg is "scrap the Constitution and set up a new government endowed with power to own and operate industry and free from any obligation to preserve individual liberty."

Here is frank recognition of the fact that private ownership of industry and individual liberty are obstacles in the way of N.R.A. If the present program of regimentation of N.R.A. should break upon the rocks of individual liberty and of private ownership, then liberty and individualism must be removed to clear the way for N.R.A. Here is frank avowal that at the end of the road down which the administration has set its feet lie Government ownership and operation of industry, the abrogation of the bill of rights, the destruction of individual liberty.

When 125,000,000 people are dazed by disaster, beset with doubts, and eager to grasp any project which seems to hold out hope, is not a proper time for statesmen to set their feet upon a road which might in any extremity lead to a government "free from any obligation to preserve individual liberty of action."

Lately there has come a slight halt in expressions of contempt for American institutions. Professor Tugwell has taken occasion to avow his conservation and his devotion to the processes of democracy. Administration spokesmen, heretofore fond of rolling the word "revolution" from their tongues, have dropped the "r" and adopted, pianissimo, the word "evolution." More discreet, the President describes the revolution as reorganization, and the N.R.A., as "representative government in industry." All this sounds fine, but the demands for more and more power continue insatiably. The communications bill, with its potentialities for the control of the press; the stock exchange bill, with its extension of power over credit to industry; the A.A.A. bill, with its broader power to license and regiment food producers; the threat to force a code upon telegraph companies; these and other measures upon which the administration is insisting, even while they soft-pedal their public utterances, are not reassuring. Can anyone doubt that the "r" will be added to evolution if the present supine Congress is continued?

But someone will say, "You are shadow-boxing; American liberty is not endangered."

Is liberty safe when hundreds of millions of dollars are appropriated in bulk to be expended at the discretion of the Executive? The jealous control by the people of taxation and of Government expenditures has, throughout many centuries, been the first line of offense and the last line of defense for freemen in their struggle against tyranny. Burdensome and unjust taxation, grinding down the people, and encumbering their means of livelihood have been the prolific cause of revolts and revolutions.

Is liberty safe when Congress, at the behest of the Executive, hands over to an appointive officer, not only the power to lay heavy taxes upon the necessaries of life but power also to designate the beneficiary class which shall receive proceeds of such taxation?

Is liberty secure when Government, without even a hearing, can abrogate contracts in the fulfillment of which individuals have invested their personal resources and upon which thousands of people depend for their daily bread?

Is liberty safe when Government not only countenances but advises boycotts? When it is a crime to possess gold coins? When a tailor can be sent to jail for cutting a nickel off the code price? Except in degree, what is the line of distinction between sending that tailor to jail and the Soviet method of shooting railway engineers for bringing trains in late?

Is liberty safe when government boards or bureaus of officials can legislate rules and regulations which interfere with every phase of private business, which regiment and control whole industries, which discriminate or fail to discriminate between localities and local conditions, and which not only can but have closed coal mines, textile industries, and many industries, not merely in Kentucky but right here in Missouri?

Make no mistake about it. "You cannot extend the mastery of government over the daily lives of the people without somewhere making it the master of men's souls and thoughts. * * * Free speech does not live many hours after free industry and free commerce die." No man can be politically free whose associates are regimented, whose prices, wages, and volume of production are fixed by law, whose business is licensed. Economic liberty is an inseparable part of individual liberty.

Is liberty safe when government piles bureau upon bureau, beneficiary class upon beneficiary class? When the number of those who are employed by the Government, plus the number of those who are beneficiaries of class taxation, plus the voting dependents of these classes, equal half of the voting population, what then has become of free government?

Is liberty safe when the Government is ceaselessly extending its control into fields hitherto reserved for States, cities, and individuals? The inevitable mistakes of government in these fields will be followed by new, more drastic, and more radical measures to cloak the first mistake and cover retreat from it. Government propaganda is the logical camp follower of such a program. The next step is the choking of free speech, free press, to suppress information at the source.

Is liberty safe when $3,000,000,000 deftly extracted from the savings of the people—from insurance policies, savings accounts, building-and-loan certificates, and Liberty bonds—is set up in the hands of an appointed official to be used, without accounting until after the next Presidential election, to speculate in the markets for bonds and foreign exchange?

Is liberty secure, when government is continually reaching out for new methods and more power to consolidate and concentrate the control of currency and credit in politically controlled Federal agencies and to dictate the flow of private credit, the lifeblood of business, to private industries?

Is liberty safe when all the old institutions under which America has grown great are sneered at; when individualism and human liberty are scorned; when the administration and its advisors, the Moleys, Tugwells, Richbergs, Frankfurters, and others, recognize no restraints upon the new-deal program, although their program consists principally of restraint for others?

Is liberty safe when a program put forward as a temporary measure of economic recovery becomes first a measure for reform and later is demanded as a permanent revolutionary change in the structure of government? In one short year unrestrained power has advanced from relief to revolution; from temporary regulation to permanent reorganization. Contemplating merely this one phase of the new deal, we can better understand what our forefathers meant when they counseled jealous and watchful guard over our liberties.

Is liberty safe when the wisest and far-seeing of our fellow citizens are warning that we have already traveled more than half the distance away from the American system of ordered liberty and toward the theory of dictatorship?

I quote again from the prophetic warning of Herbert Hoover:

"Not regimented mechanism * * * but freemen is our goal. Herein is the fundamental issue: A representative democracy, progressive and unafraid to meet its problems, but meeting them upon foundations of experience, and not upon the wave of emotion or the insensate demands of a radicalism which grasps at every opportunity to exploit the sufferings of a people."

We are told by some that the Republican Party is dead. If that is true, the cause of individual liberty is indeed friendless. Others tell us that the party must be reorganized and turn sharply to the left; conservative in part, but red enough to weaken the opposition. That is the counsel of opportunism.

Before we run up the white flag of despair or trim the sails of passing madness, let us remember that 16,000,000 men and women in 1932 loyally stood by the colors refusing, even under the stress and strain of depression, to abandon the Republican faith. In what respect does patriotism, not political opportunism, demand a change in their faith?

Republicans believe that society can and ought to provide relief for all who, though able and willing to work, are, through no fault of their own, unemployed. Undernourishment, sickness, technological unemployment will be with us long after the depression has passed. These, too, are social problems which must be met. The name of relief should not be used as a cloak to promote expensive, nonproductive projects, to employ men to do vain and useless tasks, to foster indigence, or to recklessly dissipate the resources of those people who are still able to care for themselves. The administration of relief is always a local problem. The Red Cross and local agencies of community service should be used. They should not be scrapped to build upon the sympathies and the distress of the people a political machine.

Republicans earnestly desire economic recovery. They have submerged considerations of party advantage and have supported all proper measures for recovery. They will continue to support all measures which hold reasonable hope for recovery and are in harmony with American institutions.

Our people were not informed that the administration purposed revolution. They were not told that permanent reorganization of our social, political, and economic systems was intended. Any such purpose was on the contrary concealed. No such program has ever received even a casual approval of the American people. Such a program is fraught with such grave perils to the liberties and the welfare of our people that a decent regard for their safety demands that it should not be attempted unless and until the people, after full opportunity for information and debate, shall sanction it.

Republicans will utterly oppose the managed economy of political dictators; whether Fascist or Communist. We deny the statement that representative government has failed. We do not believe that any man or any set of men, any board, bureau, or commission, or any combination of governmental agencies can control the means of earning a living, or plan the daily lives of 125,000,000 as wisely as the people themselves. We do not believe that prosperity will return through the forced regimentation of industry, or the planning of dictatorial alphabetical agencies. We do believe it will speedily return through the release and free exercise of the energies, the initiative, and the liberties of the people—uncontrolled and unregimented save only to prevent abuses and to preserve equal opportunity to all.

A Republican is one who believes that the fundamental duty of government is to create and preserve conditions of peace, order, and security under which every citizen has an equal opportunity to compete on equal terms with every other in the race of life. That does not mean that government shall penalize or handicap the winners, nor that government shall so regulate the race that all competitors shall have the same reward. It does mean that every man shall have the right to work and to earn in accordance with his own desires, and to enjoy, free from unwarranted intrusions either by individuals or the Government itself, the fruits which his abilities, his industry, and his initiative have earned.

In this connection we quote with full approval the words of Lincoln: "Property is the fruit of labor; property is desirable; is a positive good in the world. Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself, thus assuring, by example, that his own shall be safe from violence when he builds it."

Republicans believe in sound, stable, unmanaged honest money. The experience of centuries has demonstrated that gold is the most satisfactory basis for such a currency.

A Republican is one who believes in the inviolability of a public obligation. Never under Republican administration has the good faith and rigid integrity of government obligations been violated. The willful, needless abrogation of the gold clause in public obligations and its concomitant abrogation in private contracts was and is an act of moral and intellectual dishonesty, which is alike disastrous and unnecessary.

Republicans believe with Lincoln that "a majority held in constraint by constitutional checks and limitations is the only true sovereign of a free people." They believe in the constitutional division of power into the three independent departments—executive, legislative, and judicial. They believe in a strong central government possessing the powers ceded in the Constitution, but they also believe in local government in local and State matters.

They condemn the practical consolidation of the legislative and executive departments under the "new deal"; the intrusion of the Federal Government into State concerns; the attempt to control business enterprises which do not reach beyond State lines.

Republicans believe that individual liberty is the most precious possession of the American people. If they possess liberty, economic ills can be endured, economic losses can be recovered. If they have liberty, they will wrest prosperity from a wilderness of woe. If liberty is lost, all is lost.

To guarantee liberty, our forefathers set up the Constitution with its bill of rights. They enumerated freedom of religion; freedom of speech; freedom of the press; the inviolability of the home; the security of life, liberty, and property under due process of law; and the right of trial by jury as rights which are possessed by every citizen, high or low. These rights they held to be God-given, unalienable—rights so sacred that not even the Government could infringe upon them or abrogate them.

On this Thomas Jefferson, who penned the Declaration of Independence, strikes hands with Abraham Lincoln, who said he had "never held a political principle not embodied in the Declaration of Independence."

The founders of America held that the Government has no rights or powers except those which the people, through the Constitution, have ceded to it; the new deal proceeds upon the assumption that the people have no rights except such as the Government concedes to them.

Republicans utterly deny and condemn this principle of the new deal. It is the principle which under the guise of "divine right of kings" held the world stagnant for a thousand years. It is the foundation stone of dictatorship. We point to its failure as a stimulus of progress throughout all history. We point to its present practice in Russia, Italy, and Germany, where it has ripened logically into complete dictatorships. We are alarmed and concerned by the spread of this principle on our own soil, as evidenced by the attempted regimentation of industry and agriculture by the willful violation of personal and property rights without a hearing, by the suppression of information, the attempts to consolidate and control our communications system, by the abdication of its duties by Congress, and by the many instances of Executive usurpation.

Republicans have traditionally upheld the Constitution and the bill of rights as the bulwark of American liberty. They reaffirm their allegiance to it. They deny that it may be emasculated or suspended because of emergency. Liberty is not seasonal. The guaranties of the Constitution do not ebb and flow with the economic tides. When discouragement is greatest, when initiative is lowest, when difficulties pile highest, that is the time to cling closest to the guaranties of liberty defined in the American Constitution.

These, I believe, are the cardinal tenets of the Republican faith. They are lamely stated. They cannot be adequately stated in a few paragraphs. They are as conservative as the sober lessons of experience. They are as liberal as the attainable longings of the human heart. Under their operation this Nation has developed a civilization unequaled in history. Under them wealth has been more broadly diffused, the good things of life more widely enjoyed, the common man more highly exalted than under any other system ever devised. Within the limits of their application there is abundant room for all useful efforts to reform, all practical measures for the advancement of justice, equality of opportunity, and promoting human happiness. Within them there are no impediments; there is only incentive and stimulus for the development of a fairer, higher, and holier civilization than this one.

On the basis of these principles we invite the cooperation and the support of all Americans in the perpetuation of the American liberty under the ordered rule of equal laws, in the maintenance of a government not of men but of laws, and in the defense of the rights, the opportunities, and the liberties of a free people.

THE NEW DEAL—ADDRESS BY FORMER REPRESENTATIVE J. N. TINCHER

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by former Representative J. N. Tincher, of Kansas, at a Reno County (Kans.) bar banquet on the subject of the New Deal.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEW DEAL

(At a Reno County (Kans.) bar banquet, held in honor of the justices of our circuit court of appeals, the committee on program assigned to J. N. Tincher the duty of speaking affirmatively for the new deal. He said:)

Surely it is disloyal, if not treason, to criticize the new deal.

On the subject of farm relief our leader said in Topeka during the campaign:

"When the futility of maintaining prices of wheat and cotton through so-called 'stabilization' became apparent, the President's Farm Board invented the cruel joke of advising farmers to allow 20 percent of their wheat lands to lie idle, to plow up every third row of cotton, and to shoot every tenth dairy cow. Surely they knew that his advice would not, indeed, could not, be taken. It was probably offered as the foundation of an alibi. They wanted to be able to say to the farmers, 'You did not do as we told you to do. Blame yourselves.'"

We want to call your attention to how unfair the opposition to our new leader is. They claim now that under the new deal they have the matured cotton of the 1933 crop plowed under; they claim that under the new deal they are having wheat production reduced 20 percent and corn production reduced 20 percent. They even go so far as to claim that they are buying up dairy cows for slaughter; they print the statement that in the fall of 1933 millions of pigs were slaughtered and their carcasses cast into the river, and they claim that since that time the process tax is about the same as the farmer receives for hogs.

We deny these false charges against our leader; deny that these things are being done in conflict with the principle enunciated in the Topeka speech.

In this same Topeka speech our leader said:

"The plan must not be coercive; it must be voluntary; and the individual producer at all times shall have the opportunity of nonparticipation if he so desires."

The enemies of the new deal claim that our leader and those working under his direction have not kept faith in this regard, and they claim that a bill has been passed in Congress called the "Bankhead bill." This bill was signed by our President, and they claim that it provides for a confiscatory tax to be collected on every bale of cotton produced by the American cotton producer in excess of the amount he has been granted leave to produce. They claim this law not only confers upon the Secretary of Agriculture the power but obligates the Secretary to not permit a farmer to produce more than 60 percent of what he had previously produced.

The enemies of the new deal claim that the "brain trusters" working under the direction of the President are in favor of extending the provisions of this law to other agricultural products so that before any farmer could run his own business he would have to get a permit. We who live here in Kansas know that these statements are false. We can still hear our great leader's voice ringing out when he said:

"The plan must not be coercive; it must be voluntary; and the individual producer at all times have the opportunity of nonparticipation if he so desires."

We brand as false the statement that the Bankhead bill was ever passed or was ever signed by the President. It is my privilege to know the Bankheads. They have always been a family of statesmen, standing strong for personal liberties, State rights, and would never surrender the right of the individual farmer to raise as much crop as he wanted to, and they would never advocate a bill that would submit a farmer to the indignities of having to obtain licenses from the Federal Government before he could plow his field.

Such propaganda against the new deal is unfair, and I personally object to my friend BANKHEAD, in particular, being charged with being connected with "the first compulsory farm control", and I insist that we are still standing on the principle enunciated at Topeka: "The plan must not be coercive; it must be voluntary."

I will now discuss some other matters.

Take for instance the attitude of Orville Wright, Charles A. Lindbergh, Clarence Chamberlin, Eddie Rickenbacker, and that class and type of men offering their judgment on aviation as against the impulse or guess of "new dealers" like James A. Farley or Hugo L. Black.

It may take some little time to educate some of the public on the new deal. Now, it may be that some of you judges and justices may now know the new deal on fraud. It is presumed, and, like insanity in a criminal case, its suggestion stops everything. When suggested, fraud cancels everything nationally. Of course, if your previous conduct has been satisfactory, especially in the even-numbered years, like 1932, it is different. Let me state the new rule accurately for the benefit of our guests.

The naked charge of fraud not proven vitiates everything domestic and within our boundaries, but this rule does not apply "Pan American"; and if any part of the contract vitiated is "Pan American", or otherwise foreign, that portion of the contracts remain in force until otherwise ordered by the "brain trust."

Speaking of contracts, our beloved President made one with the American people in 1932. It was in the form of a platform in writing, which document he construed and explained so there could be no misunderstanding of its meaning.

It would take me a long time to properly defend against what must be the false charges of abandonment of that contract, so I must confine myself to a few specific instances.

SOUND MONEY

Remember Hoover told at Des Moines how close an escape our country had a few months before from being forced off the gold standard.

REMEMBER

Our leader of the new deal at Seattle, at Butte, and at Brooklyn said:

"The Democratic platform specifically declares, 'We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards.'"

He said:

"That is plain English. It is stated without qualifications in the platform, and I have announced my unqualified acceptance of that platform."

He said that the statement of Hoover was "a libel on the credit of the United States."

He quoted CARTER GLASS to prove by what our leader termed the "magnificent philippic of Senator GLASS" that the Republicans were seeing visions of rubber dollars and called those charges a campaign of fear, and he said, "Sound currency must be maintained at all hazards."

Surely the claim that our leader has violated these statements, agreements, and promises is unfounded. Take this news item of March 6, 1933—

"The gold standard is suspended internally under trading with the enemy act."

This news item, we, the defenders of the new deal, brand as false.

April 20, 1933: "Yes; we are off the gold standard.—William H. Woodin."

Whoever Woodin is, or was, we deny that statement.

News item, January 31, 1934: "The President today signed the gold reserve bill fixing the value of the dollar at 59.06 cents in gold."

We pronounce this item false and the agencies that circulate it as disloyal. If such things are to be continued by the press, we will censure it.

Henry Morgenthau, Jr.: "This country is on a gold-bullion standard with its dollar marked down to 59 cents. It might be termed the 1934 model of gold standard, with knee action, air flow, and stream-lined."

For shame, Mr. Morgenthau, Jr., you old neighbor; you who was the forgotten man until our leader remembered you.

Pardon me for taking so much time defending the new deal on the currency, but I was talking with a fellow a few days ago who recently saw some currency, and he assures me it is still sound even though CARTER GLASS, the author of the "magnificent philippic", has slipped and "don't" seem to fully comprehend the new deal. Funny how men like GLASS can change between campaigns, but our great leader remains firm.

There are a lot of things I should like to close with. Take for instance, we have been just as consistent in our foreign policies, contracts, and pledges as in our domestic dealings, and much could be said on that subject, but there is one thing I simply must not pass up. October 20, 1932, our leader said at Indianapolis—

"The Hoover administration is committed to the idea of central control in Washington"—

Our leader said:

"Now, ever since the time of Thomas Jefferson, that has been the exact reverse of the Democratic concept."

Our leader in that same speech said that Hoover's conduct in that respect had increased the cost of government $1,000,000,000 in 4 years by such conduct. He said:

"I regard reduction in Federal spending as the most important issue in this campaign."

He said:

"The reduction of Federal spending will be the most direct and effective contribution that Government can make to business."

At St. Louis, October 21, he said:

"The Hoover administration has been responsible for deficit after deficit."

He said:

"It is my pledge and my promise that this dangerous kind of financing shall be stopped and that rigid governmental economy shall be forced by a stern and unremitting administrative policy of living within our income."

I am sure our leader of the new deal meant every word uttered, so I brand as false propaganda the claim that he has set up new agencies in Washington, such as A.A.A., C.A.B., C.C.C., C.W.A., C.W.S., E.H.C., E.H.F.A., F.A.C.A., F.C.A., F.C.T., F.D.I.C., F.D.L.B., F.E.R.A., F.S.R.C., H.L.B., H.O.L.C., N.L.B., N.R.A., P.W.A., R.F.C., T.V.A.

We, for the sake of consistency, deny that the new deal has created a single new bureau or new office.

We especially deny that our leader of the new deal in his message of January 4, 1934, said that the excess of expenditures over receipts for the fiscal year had been $7,000,000,000.

We most strenuously deny any desire for power or the stronger Central Government, and we promise to balance the Budget sometime.

We defy all doubters in the new deal, and we pronounce all critics, such as Lindbergh, etc., publicity seekers or money changers or some other brand of disloyal crooks or traitors.

And now, at final close, I quote CARTER GLASS of April 10 as saying:

"The new deal, taken all in all, is not only a mistake, it is a disgrace to the Nation, and the time is not far distant when we shall be ashamed of having wandered so far from the dictates of common sense and common honesty."

This statement or quotation was published in the Washington Post and published in our western papers April 10. I would not designate this statement as a "magnificent philippic." In fact, I never designated any of Senator GLASS' statements as magnificent philippics; however, as the author of the law on which our whole financial structure is based, the Federal Reserve Act, as an author and coworker in the formation of the farm-land loan banks and so many other so-called "reforms" of our old system, Mr. GLASS is deserving of some notice. We cannot have a campaign based on the success of the new deal and ignore his charges against it. So far as I am concerned in defending the new deal, I must be content to say in the true Democratic way that his charges are false; that his statements are without foundation; that he was probably jailed during the World War for disloyalty, and that if he does not quit talking that way in the American Congress, BULWINKLE, or some other kind of a "winkle" will expose his past. I guess that is the way we will handle the situation.

So far as my opponent, Mr. Huxman, is concerned, I have tried to respect his processes of reasoning in delivering this address. I have heard him reason for about 20 years now, and I know I am reasoning absolutely in accord with his line of thought. While he was yet a Democrat and before he joined the opposition he used to advance just about such denials and affirmative statements as I have made tonight.

(Mr. Huxman, an active Democrat, was assigned the negative. His speech was not preserved.)

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The clerk will proceed to call the calendar for unobjected bills under the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 882) to provide for the more effective supervision of foreign commercial transactions, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 506) conferring upon the President the power to reduce subsidies, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHITE. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 583) relating to the classified civil service was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 316) relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2359) to provide for the disposition of unclaimed deposits in national banks was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. McKELLAR. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2500) to aid in relieving the existing national emergency through the free distribution to the needy of cotton and cotton products was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2018) relative to Members of Congress acting as attorneys in matters where the United States has an interest was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

WILSON G. BINGHAM—RECOMMITTAL

The bill (H.R. 2632) for the relief of Wilson G. Bingham was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SHEPPARD subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask permission to recur to Calendar 448, the bill (H.R. 2632) for the relief of Wilson G. Bingham, for the purpose of moving to recommit the bill. It has been objected to three or four times, and I think the committee, in the light of the objections, should reframe the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, to what bill does the Senator refer?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is Order of Business 448, being the bill (H.R. 2632) for the relief of Wilson G. Bingham.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to move to recommit the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to recurring to Order of Business 448 for the purpose indicated? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs in order that the committee may reframe the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2411) to amend the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act of 1933 was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 31) consenting that certain States may sue the United States and providing for trial on the merits in any suit brought hereunder by a State to recover direct taxes alleged to have been illegally collected by the United States during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1866, 1867, and 1868, and vesting the right in each State to sue in its own name was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2788) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes as amended (relating to State taxation of national banking associations) was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2800) to prevent the manufacture, shipment, and sale of adulterated or misbranded food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics, and to regulate traffic therein; to prevent the false advertisement of food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics; and for other purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGES NEAR ATCHISON, KANS.

The bill (S. 2334) authorizing the city of Atchison, Kans., and the county of Buchanan, Mo., or either of them, or the States of Kansas and Missouri, or either of them, or the highway departments of such States, acting jointly or severally, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Missouri River at or near Atchison, Kans., was announced as next in order, being the same as calendar 703.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I want it made clear that I am not unalterably opposed to this bill. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] who is in charge of the bill is familiar with negotiations which are going on and which will undoubtedly result in the removal of the objection which I have to the bill. For the present I ask that it may go over.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the statement of the Senator from Ohio. A great many people in Kansas are deeply interested in the measure. There is every reason why it should be passed at once. The present facilities for bridge purposes across the Missouri River at Atchison are entirely inadequate. This meritorious measure has the approval of the State highway departments of both Kansas and Missouri. I hope very much we may have definite action on the measure before the adjournment of the present session of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (H.R. 6898) authorizing the city of Atchison, Kans., and the county of Buchanan, Mo., or either of them, or the States of Kansas and Missouri, or either of them, or the highway departments of such States, acting jointly or severally, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Missouri River at or near Atchison, Kans., was announced as next in order.

Mr. BULKLEY. Let the bill go over for the same reason just stated as to Order of Business 617.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (H.R. 7581) to authorize a board composed of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Agriculture to negotiate with foreign buyers with the view of selling American agricultural surplus products at the world market price and to accept in payment therefor silver coin or bullion at such value as may be agreed upon which shall not exceed 25 percent above the world market price of silver, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue silver certificates based upon the agreed value of such silver bullion or coin in payment for the products sold, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1978) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of laws and to punish the crime of lynching was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 7) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to taxes on certain incomes was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 493) to protect labor in its old age, the amendments to which up to page 5 had heretofore been agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 5, line 6, in section 10, after the word "State", to insert the words "or Territory"; in line 8, after the words "State-wide", to insert "or Territory-wide"; in line 9, after the word "State", to insert "or Territory"; in line 13, after the word "State", to insert "or Territory"; in line 14, after the word "State", to insert "or Territory"; in line 16, after the word "old", to strike out "or over" and insert in lieu thereof "except up to January 1, 1939, plans may be approved in which the age requirement is above 65 but no more than 70 years"; in line 23, after the word "State", to insert "or Territory"; and on page 6, line 10, after the word "State", to insert "or Territory", so as to make the section read:

CONTENTS OF PLAN

SEC. 10. The bureau shall not approve any plan submitted by the State or Territory authority which does not provide that—

(1) The plan shall be State-wide or Territory-wide, and if administered by subdivisions of the State or Territory shall be mandatory on such subdivisions.

(2) An old person entitled to relief under it:

(a) Is a citizen of the United States and a resident of the State or Territory for a period of years determined by the State or Territory law providing old-age assistance;

(b) Is 65 years old, except up to January 1, 1939, plans may be approved in which the age requirement is above 65 but no more than 70 years;

(c) Does not possess real and/or personal property of a value in excess of $5,000; and

(d) Has no child or other person responsible under the law of the State or Territory for his support and able to support him.

(3) There shall not be charged against the allotment made under this act more than one-third of the total sum paid to aged persons under the plan, except that payments made in excess of $1 a day to any such person and payments made to persons who are not citizens of the United States shall not be taken into account.

(4) So much of any sum paid as assistance, which shall be equivalent to the share paid from the allotment under this act, shall be a lien on the estate of the assisted person, and upon his death shall be collected by the State or Territory and reported to the bureau provided in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in section 11, on page 6, line 13, after the word "State", to insert "or Territory", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. The State or Territory authority may at any time submit proposed changes in the plan to the bureau, which may approve such changes if they are in accord with the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, on page 6, line 17, in the subtitle after the word "State", to insert the words "or Territory"; in line 18, after the word "State", to insert the words "or Territory"; in line 23, after the word "State", to insert the words "or Territory"; on page 7, line 2, after the word "State" to insert "or Territory"; and in line 6, after the word "State", to insert "or Territory", so as to make the section read:

REPORTS BY STATE OR TERRITORY AUTHORITY

SEC. 12. (1) The State or Territory authority shall annually, on or before the 1st day of May of each year, or as soon thereafter as possible, submit to the bureau a statement—

(a) Of the amount of the appropriation made by the State or Territory for the period of the ensuing fiscal year for the purpose of assistance without including any part of the expenses of administration;

(b) An estimate of the sum which must be contributed by any political subdivision of the State or Territory during such year for the purpose of assistance without including any part of the expenses of administration;

(c) A statement of the amount collected, if any, from the estate of any assisted person for which the State or Territory is accountable to the United States under section 10, subsection (4); and

(d) An estimate of the amount unexpended of any allotment made from appropriation under this act for the current year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 13, after the word "State", to strike out "at one-half" and insert "or Territory at one-third"; and in line 15, after the word "such", to strike out "one-half" and insert "one-third", so as to make the paragraph read:

(2) (a) The bureau shall compute annually the amount of allotment to be given such State or Territory at one-third of the sum of (a) and (b) of subsection (1) of this section, after deducting from such one-third the sum of (d) and (c) of such subsection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this is a very important measure. I am in sympathy with the purposes of the proposed legislation. I think, however, that its provisions ought to be discussed, and I request the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to explain the bill.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the bill was reported unanimously to the Senate at the last session of Congress, but we never had a chance to take it up for consideration. At this session the committee had further hearings, and the bill was further considered and again reported unanimously.

I invite attention to the fact that the President is authorized, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the measure, to take funds from the relief instead of the Treasury. There are 28 States which now have old-age pension laws, and this bill is for the purpose of assisting those States and others which may later adopt old-age pension laws.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the arrangement for cooperation between the Federal Government and the States?

Mr. DILL. The Government will provide one-third of the money in those States which have old-age pension laws. As originally proposed, the bill provided for the Federal Government to contribute one-half, but the Secretary of Labor suggested it be made one-third, and the committee was glad to agree to the suggestion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, what about those States which have no old-age pension laws?

Mr. DILL. They would not come under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does it provide for them to come under the provisions of the bill in any way?

Mr. DILL. Yes; if they enact old-age pension laws in conformity with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What would be the total cost to the Government?

Mr. DILL. Not to exceed $10,000,000. If every State in the Union were to come under the terms of the bill, it is estimated it would cost not to exceed $35,000,000 or $40,000,000, which could be used if all the States should enact old-age pension laws. That will be some years in the future, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The total amount would be three times the amount contributed by the Federal Government?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the bill follows the precedent of State-aid acts?

Mr. DILL. It is designed to permit certain States to modify their acts within a certain period of time if they do not now conform to the terms of the bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it a bill proposing to extend aid to the States in granting old-age pensions rather than to have the Federal Government provide such pensions direct to individuals?

Mr. DILL. That is its purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has the Senator information as to the States which have already enacted old-age pension laws?

Mr. DILL. We have only the information which was given in the hearings. In every State where such a law has been enacted it has been found so successful that the example has spread to adjoining States. After many years the cost of taking care of the aged poor is found to be about one-third less under this system than by the poorhouse system, and it is because of that fact that it has become so popular among the States.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is not true that a number of States have enacted measures of this type recently and have voted overwhelmingly for them?

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes; overwhelmingly. The popular support of this kind of relief is amazing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think legislation of this character is inevitable, and I shall make no objection to its consideration at this time.

Mr. DILL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I think the bill ought to go over. It is a very important bill, and we have not had time to study it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

BILL INDEFINITELY POSTPONED

The bill (S. 2439) for the relief of the Goldsmith Metal Lath Co., Price-Evans Foundry Corporation, and R. W. Felix was announced as next in order.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the entire text of this bill was adopted by the Senate as an amendment to another bill which has since become law. This bill, therefore, should be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Without objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1842) to amend sections 211, 245, and 312 of the Criminal Code, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SALE OF REAL ESTATE UNDER COURT ORDER

The bill (H.R. 1567) amending section 1 of the act of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat.L. 751), providing for the method of selling real estate under an order or decree of any United States court was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee withhold the objection for the present?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I will withhold it.

Mr. STEPHENS. When this bill was last called, I was asked whether or not the Attorney General had given his approval to it. I wrote him about the matter, and have a letter from him. After discussing it he says:

In my opinion, this is a desirable amendment.

Referring to the bill which we have before us. He suggests, however, that there should be an amendment, on page

2, line 6, after the words "Provided further, That", to insert "in the event of a private sale."

I stated the other day that the former Attorney General had approved the bill, and the present Attorney General has approved it, and I understand that this is now the law in many States. I hope the Senator will not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I have not examined the bill. The private sale of property in the hands of a chancery court or a court of equity is so foreign to what we have been accustomed to in our State that I think we ought to give the bill a little more consideration; and I ask that it go over for the day.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on a former occasion when this bill was called on the calendar I objected to its consideration. I have made some study of it, and find that a sale shall not be confirmed if it shall have been made for less than two-thirds of the apprized value. The apprized value is to be ascertained by three disinterested persons appointed by the court. The court has entire control of the matter.

There probably are instances in which more would be realized from the sale of property under the arrangement contemplated in this bill than under the ordinary public sale. Personally, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks that the bill go over. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

SNARE & TRIEST CO.

The bill (S. 1760) for the relief of the Snare & Triest Co., now Frederick Snare Corporation was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection to this bill?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. I have a letter relative to this bill under date of the 24th of May from the Secretary of the Navy. I read one sentence from it:

> While it is clear from the decision of the court, as set forth in detail in the Navy Department's report of December 8, 1933, on said bill, which report is printed in Senate Report No. 836, the United States is not legally liable for the losses suffered by the contractor, the Navy Department believes that from the viewpoint of equity the granting of relief is justified by the circumstances existing in this case and it, therefore, recommends the enactment of the bill, S. 1760, as amended by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with one observation I shall withdraw the objection.

I think that where litigation follows the contention that the Government is indebted to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff, through inadvertence or negligence or otherwise, fails to present his case in full, and a period of time goes by, and the statute of limitations has run, it is a very bad precedent to open up such cases and permit reconsideration or a direct payment. I should not object so much to letting the matter go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it ought to go to the Court of Claims. Why should it not go there?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the facts in this case are somewhat complicated, but the issue which I think is presented to the Senate is very simple.

This case did go to the Court of Claims. The amount carried in the bill was the amount found by the Court of Claims to be occasioned by the delay complained of; but the Court of Claims held that it could not enter judgment against the United States, because the acts complained of arose out of the sovereign acts of the Government rather than out of its acts as a contractor. The simple question is, I think, whether an entirely innocent contractor shall suffer this loss or whether the Government shall pay the amount of damages which its court had found to be due because of its failure to provide the necessary funds as and when they were contemplated.

That is all there is in the case. The amount has been found by the Court of Claims, and it has been found to be due to 420 days of delay in fulfilling the contract, due entirely to the Government's own default.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Snare & Triest Co., now Frederick Snare Corporation, the sum of $83,978.05, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States, for damages for delay in carrying out its contract with the Navy Department, no. 3762, and agreements supplemental thereto for waterfront improvements, piers, and breakwater, at the submarine base, Key West, Fla., as reported January 13, 1925, by a board of which Rear Admiral H. H. Rousseau, Civil Engineer Corps, United States Navy, was senior member.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that the letter from the Secretary of the Navy, to which I have referred, be printed in connection with the bill.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 24, 1934.

MY DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: Further reference is made to your letter of May 14, 1934, submitting a copy of the amended bill, S. 1760 (for the relief of the Snare & Triest Co., now Frederick Snare Corporation), together with a copy of Senate Report No. 836, Seventy-third Congress, second session, and requesting that you be advised "if the Department can see its way clear to concur in the view taken by the Committee on Claims that the bill should be passed, as amended, for the reasons stated in the report of the committee."

The bill as originally introduced, conferred jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and adjudicate the claim of the corporation for damages alleged to have been sustained as the result of delays due to the Government or from other causes arising out of contract no. 3762, dated November 13, 1919, for the development and completion of a submarine base at Key West, Fla., for which the United States may be justly liable.

The amended bill accompanying your letter authorizes the direct payment to the claimant of $83,978.05 for the aforesaid delays "as reported January 13, 1925, by a board of which Rear Admiral H. H. Rousseau, Civil Engineer Corps, United States Navy, was senior member."

The amount proposed is the additional expense that was found by the aforesaid board and by the Court of Claims to have been incurred by the contractors by reason of 420 days' delay, in completing the work under contract no. 3762. This delay, the court found, was due to three causes: (1) Storms, bad weather, and break-downs of the dredging equipment, (2) changes made by the Government from time to time in the work, and (3) the delay of the Congress in making supplemental appropriations for the work; and while unable to determine just what part of the total delay was chargeable to the contractor and to the Government, respectively, the court stated that cause (1) "contributed in a substantial way to the slowing down of the progress of the work", and that "a greater portion" of the delay arose out of cause (2), but that "principally" the delay arose out of cause (3). The court expressed disapproval of the view taken by the board with respect to cause (1) that:

"The board does not understand that these delays, which, after all, are of comparatively minor character and are incidental to the execution of almost any public-work contract, and which ran concurrently with the delays caused by the Government, would modify or reduce the responsibility of the Government in case the Government is actually liable for damages arising out of the two major delays."

While it is clear from the decision of the court as set forth in detail in the Navy Department's report of December 8, 1933, on said bill, which report is printed in Senate Report No. 836, the United States is not legally liable for the losses suffered by the contractor, the Navy Department believes that from the viewpoint of equity the granting of relief is justified by the circumstances existing in this case, and it, therefore, recommends the enactment of the bill S. 1760 as amended by the Committee on Claims.

Sincerely yours,

CLAUDE A. SWANSON.

HON. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the letter recommend payment?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; the Secretary recommends this amendment.

Mr. KING. I regret that there is nothing to indicate why the Navy was negligent in carrying out the contract, or, if it was in default, the reason for such default. It seems to me the Navy ought to be censured for its delay if it is at fault, as a result of which the Government is now compelled to pay $83,000.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2915) requiring national banks to obtain indemnity bonds from State-qualified bonding companies, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LOANS TO CORPORATIONS ENGAGED IN FARMING AND FRUIT GROWING

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1744) enabling certain farmers and fruit growers to receive the benefits of the Federal Farm Loan Act and amendments thereto, and the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the word "individuals", at the end of the bill, to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That corporations engaged solely in farming or in fruit growing shall be eligible for loans or for refinancing under the Federal Farm Loan Act and amendments thereto and under the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 in the same manner and to the same extent as individuals: Provided, That no such loan shall be made unless the notes or evidences of indebtedness of the corporation are endorsed by the principal executive officers and the majority of the directors of such corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of this bill. I should like to know in what respect it modifies existing law or extends the provisions of any of the laws relating to loans to agriculture or industry.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is in the rear of the Chamber.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida for a brief explanation of Senate bill 1744, enabling certain farmers and fruit growers to receive the benefits of the Federal Farm Loan Act and amendments thereto, and the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in some States corporations have been formed which actually operate farms—fruit groves and that sort of thing. The idea of this bill is to give such corporations the same benefit under the law that an individual farmer has. In Wyoming, for instance, I understand that most of the stock raising is done by corporations which at present are not eligible for loans. In the State of Florida there are a great many large groves, comprising thousands of acres, owned and operated by corporations. They are not eligible for loans under the Farm Loan Act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. When the Federal farm loan bill was under consideration it was, I believe, before a committee of which the Senator from Florida was a member, if he was not chairman of it. I am not certain as to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Florida if this subject was not fully considered and discussed, and if it was not concluded by his committee and by the Senate at that time that the benefits of the bill should be made available only for individuals or natural persons who engage in farming. I ask him if it was not thought then that it was questionable policy to invite and encourage and assist corporations to engage in farming in competition with natural persons.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is quite true, and for that reason I think the committee recommended the amendment to this bill which obliges the officers of the corporation to assume the obligation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In line with what the Senator has said, there are many orchardists in the State of Michigan who are incorporated. They are in effect individual farmers, but legally they are operating incorporated entities. The necessity for farm-loan credit is precisely as great in their instance as in any others; and I cordially agree with the Senator from Florida that equality of treatment requires some action of this character.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am inclined to think so. I do not see why people forming a corporation and actually engaging in agriculture and horticulture should not be eligible for loans under the farm-loan system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF TEMPORARY PLAN FOR DEPOSIT INSURANCE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3025) to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. GLASS, Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. WALCOTT, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also move that the bill be printed showing the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION OF WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I move that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to provide for controlled expansion of the currency and the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I make the point of order that the motion is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is correct. The Chair sustains the point of order.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2980) to modify the effect of certain Chippewa Indian treaties on areas in Minnesota was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 102) authorizing and directing the Comptroller General of the United States to certify for payment certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920 as per a certain contract authorized by the President was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2426) to provide funds for cooperation with the public-school board at Wolf Point, Mont., in construction or improvement of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3484) relating to the sale of cotton held for producers by the 1933 cotton producers' pool was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill is the unfinished business, and will be passed over.

LOSSES OF COOPERATIVE MARKETING ASSOCIATIONS

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 86) for adjustment and settlement of losses sustained by the cooperative-marketing associations was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was about to ask that this measure go over, but the Senator from Utah has objected.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Utah would withhold his objection for a moment.

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection.

Mr. FRAZIER. This joint resolution simply provides that there may be an investigation and an adjustment in behalf of both cotton and grain cooperative organizations which made contracts and cooperated with the Farm Board and the Stabilization Corporation in carrying out the provisions of the Farm Board Act. They held their grain and cotton off the market at the request of the Farm Board, they paid storage on it, they paid insurance, and when the market finally broke they lost money. I believe they are entitled to some consideration, and they cannot get it from the present set-up.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, how much would be involved in the settlement of these claims?

Mr. FRAZIER. Not a great amount. I think, perhaps, it would be some three or four hundred thousand dollars. It involves many cooperative organizations, both cotton and grain.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. FRAZIER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. My understanding is that some of the cooperatives of the South, organizations alleged to be cooperatives, which are scarcely entitled to that appellation, are making claims amounting to millions, notwithstanding the fact that a very large sum, tens of millions of dollars, was expended in their behalf, under the direction of and by some of the officials now controlling some of the activities of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FRAZIER. So far as I know, there is no claim that runs into any excessive amount at all. Of course, it would be up to the present set-up to conduct the investigation and make a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments, on page 1, line 8, after the word "grain", to insert the words "and/or cotton"; on page 2, line 6, after the word "grain", to insert the words "and/or cotton"; and on line 7, after the word "grain", to insert the words "and/or cotton", so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of adjustment and settlement of losses sustained by the cooperative marketing associations dealing in grain during the stabilization operations of the Federal Farm Board in the years 1929 and 1930, when such cooperative marketing associations were induced and requested by the Federal Farm Board to withhold grain and/or cotton from the market and to make advances to their members in order to stabilize prices, the Federal Farm Credit Administration is hereby authorized and directed to make such adjustments and settlements in accordance with the understanding that such cooperative marketing associations had with the Federal Farm Board, and on the basis of a price or a sum equal to the amount directly loaned or advanced to such associations plus carrying charges and operation costs in connection with such grain and/or cotton from the date of the loans or advances to the date that such grain and/or cotton was finally taken over by the Federal Farm Board or delivered pursuant to its instructions.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPOINTMENT OF ASSISTANT UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS

The bill (S. 2082) to amend the first sentence of section 8 of the act of May 28, 1896, chapter 252, relative to the appointment of assistant United States attorneys was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first sentence of section 8 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, approved May 28, 1896 (29 Stat. 181), as amended (U.S.C., title 28, sec. 483), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That whenever, in the opinion of the district attorney of any district, evidenced by writing, the public interest requires it, one or more assistant district attorneys may be appointed by the Attorney General; but such opinion shall state to the Attorney General the facts as distinguished from conclusions, showing the necessity therefor."

Mr. KING. I should like to have an explanation of the bill from the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. It seems to me we have made prior provisions for the appointment of assistant attorneys and district attorneys which have been very generous.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, this bill was drafted by the Department of Justice. Under the present law, in certain cases, in order to appoint an assistant district attorney, an opinion of the district judge and of the district attorney is required. This bill simply eliminates the necessity for requiring the opinion of the judge. The Attorney General may, under this measure, not upon the opinion but upon a statement of the facts by the district attorney alone, appoint such assistant district attorney.

The district judges throughout the country take various views about the necessity for such appointments. Sometimes a district judge declines to make recommendations; others make recommendations. That has produced confusion, which has led to the belief that if the Attorney General were authorized to make such an appointment upon a statement of the facts by the district attorney alone the public interest would be served.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the district attorney would be required to state in writing the facts making necessary the appointment of the assistant.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true. The bill expressly provides that he must state the facts.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the bill, other than from the statement of the able Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary; but, from that statement, I believe the existing law is preferable to this measure. I wish to look into the matter, and for that reason I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LOANS TO INDUSTRY

The bill (S. 3520) authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to industry was announced as next in order.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, this bill was adopted as an amendment to the bill providing for loans by the Federal Reserve banks and should be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 3520 will be indefinitely postponed.

ADDITIONAL JUSTICE OF THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 1777) providing for an additional justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask for a statement of the reasons for this additional justice.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall very gladly furnish a statement of such facts as are within my knowledge.

One of the present justices of the court of appeals, because of very long and protracted service and because of his ill health, it is felt should be relieved of the very heavy duties and responsibilities of the position. In order that that may be accomplished the appointment of another justice is necessary. This proposed legislation is in line with similar legislation which has been passed with respect to districts where the judges have been infirm or incompetent to discharge their duties, and other judges have been named. Upon the death or incapacity or retirement of the one who is to be relieved, the new justice continues to serve, thus ultimately not increasing the number of justices.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator is satisfied that the appointment of this additional justice is essential to the proper administration of the law?

Mr. KING. I think so, Mr. President. I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas that the able Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, together with the members of the Judiciary Committee, have resolutely set their faces against increasing the number of Federal judges, at least for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, after the word "filled", to strike out the words "without further authorization of Congress", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, who shall possess the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same compensation and allowance as the present justices of said court.

SEC. 2. That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of justice of said court because of the death or retirement of Justice Charles H. Robb, such vacancy shall not be filled: Provided, That not more than five justices of said court shall sit at any one time, to be designated by the presiding justices of said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. AUSTIN subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar No. 977, being the bill (S. 1777) providing for an additional justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont to recur to Order of Business 977, Senate bill 1777? The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which that measure was passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 1777 was passed?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that is the bill, is it not, providing for an additional justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia?

Mr. AUSTIN. It is; and the cause for the passage of the bill has ceased to exist. It seems that Mr. Justice Robb was alleged to have been very ill. Word has been received from Mr. Justice Robb that, while he was ill, he has recovered and that he is performing his duties as usual.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the motion to reconsider should be agreed to. The statement was made by a Senator, at my request for information as to the necessity for the passage of this bill, that the justice referred to by the Senator from Vermont was ill and that the passage of the bill was necessary in order that justice might properly be administered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say so, I think the proper motion would be a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed, and then the indefinite postponement of the measure.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator who has charge of the bill, and who made the statement regarding it, is out of the Chamber at the present moment. Let it go over for the day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that the motion to reconsider be entered in order that the Senator who made the statement to which I referred may have an opportunity of being present.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have charge of this bill; I introduced the bill and I reported the bill; but I am informing the Senator the cause for the passage of the bill has passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] made the explanation of the bill a while ago, upon the request of some Senator, and it seems to me that it would be better to wait until he shall return to the Chamber.

Mr. AUSTIN. Very well; but I should like to enter the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

RETIREMENT OF RICHMOND PEARSON HOBSON AS REAR ADMIRAL

The bill (S. 3380) providing for the appointment of Richmond Pearson Hobson, formerly a captain in the United States Navy, as a rear admiral in the Navy and his retirement in that grade, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Richmond Pearson Hobson, formerly a captain of the United States Navy, a rear admiral in the Navy, with the rank, pay, and allowances thereof, and upon his acceptance of such appointment and the issuance of the commission in pursuance thereof, he shall be retired by the President as from active service and be placed upon the retired list in the grade of rear admiral, as of 30 years' service, and with the pay of that grade.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGES, PENNSYLVANIA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 8241) to authorize the construction and operation of certain bridges across the Monongahela, Allegheny, and Youghiogheny Rivers in the county of Allegheny, Pa.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to pass this bill, which was reported to the Senate on April 26, authorizing the construction and operation of certain bridges across the Monongahela, Allegheny, and Youghiogheny Rivers in Allegheny County, Pa. I have lived in this vicinity for many years and have been in a position to realize the need for this construction work. The bridges called for would facilitate interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and would safeguard the military interests of the Nation. The bill has the approval of the War and Agriculture Departments.

Application has been made by Allegheny County Authority, a public corporation created by the Legislature of Pennsylvania at its special session in November and December 1933, for a loan and grant from the Public Works Administration aggregating something over $31,000,000 to be used for the construction purposes listed in the pending bill.

There can be no question as to the need for these bridges. The bridge across the Monongahela River from Pittsburgh to Homestead is to replace what is known as "Brown's Bridge", a two-lane bridge long since obsolete and now condemned. The bridge across the Allegheny River from Pittsburgh to O'Hara Township is to replace the Highland Park Bridge, also a very old bridge, carrying two lanes of traffic only, long since obsolete, and for some years past condemned. Similar conditions apply to the other bridges listed in the bill.

The people in the vicinity of the proposed bridges are emphatically in favor of their construction. The necessity is recognized, and universal opinion is that the opportunity for constructing these bridges through Public Works funds should not be missed. The county and municipal governments lack the funds necessary for this work. However, it should be said that it is confidently anticipated that the revenues from tolls and so forth will liquidate the loan within 20 years, and that the act of assembly creating the Allegheny County Authority provides that as soon as the indebtedness shall be paid the Allegheny County Authority shall turn over to Allegheny County as free bridges all the bridges mentioned without cost to the county, and that the Allegheny County Authority, a public corporation, shall then cease to exist by limitation of law.

The approval of the engineers of the Public Works Administration, as well as Army engineers in the Rivers and Harbors Division familiar with the situation in Allegheny County, is anticipated. I earnestly urge Senate approval of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PEE DEE RIVER BRIDGES, SOUTH CAROLINA

The bill (H.R. 8714) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Pee Dee River and a bridge across the Waccamaw River, both at or near Georgetown, S.C., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WABASH RIVER BRIDGE, INDIANA

The bill (H.R. 8937) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Indiana to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Wabash River, at or near Delphi, Ind., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, ILLINOIS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 8951) authorizing the city of Shawneetown, Ill., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near a point between Washington Avenue and Monroe Street in said city of Shawneetown, and a point opposite thereto in the county of Union and State of Kentucky.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I wish to state that this bill merely provides that the town of Shawneetown, Ill., shall construct, maintain, and operate the proposed bridge at its own expense, and with no expense to the Government.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSQUEHANNA RIVER BRIDGE, PENNSYLVANIA

The bill (H.R. 9000) granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Holtwood, Lancaster County, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONNECTICUT RIVER BRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS

The bill (H.R. 9065) granting the consent of Congress to the Department of Public Works of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Connecticut River at Turners Falls, Mass., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSQUEHANNA RIVER BRIDGE, PA.

The bill (H.R. 9257) granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Bainbridge, Lancaster County, and Manchester, York County, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSQUEHANNA RIVER BRIDGE, PA.

The bill (H.R. 9271) granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Millersburg, Dauphin County, Pa., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. CROIX ISLAND NATIONAL MONUMENT, MAINE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1947) to provide for the creation of the St. Croix Island National Monument located near the mouth of the St. Croix River in the State of Maine, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, with amendments, on page 2, line 2, after the word "Croix", to insert the word "Island", and on the same page to strike out lines 22 to 25 and lines 1 to 2 on page 3, as follows:

SEC. 4. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $15,000 for the acquisition of land, $10,000 for the protection and maintenance of lands by the construction of breakwaters in order to prevent erosion, and $5,000 for beautification of said island.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That when title to all privately owned land on the St. Croix (Dochet) Island near the mouth of the St. Croix River in the State of Maine shall have been vested in the United States in fee simple, the President shall be, and is hereby, authorized by proclamation to set apart and establish said island as a national monument for the preservation of the historical remains thereon for the benefit and enjoyment of the people, and the same shall be known as the "St. Croix Island National Monument."

SEC. 2. That upon the issuance of said proclamation all the Government land comprising the lighthouse reservation on the north half of said island shall be transferred from the Department of Commerce to the administrative jurisdiction and control of the Secretary of the Interior for administration as a part of said national monument.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept donations of land and/or buildings, structures, and so forth, within the area of said monument as fixed hereunder and donations of funds for the purchase and/or maintenance thereof: Provided, That he may acquire on behalf of the United States by purchase when purchasable at prices deemed by him reasonable, otherwise by condemnation under the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888, such tracts of land within the said monument as may be necessary for the completion thereof: Provided further, That the title and evidence thereof, to all lands acquired for said national monument shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. That the administration, protection, and development of the aforesaid national monument shall be exercised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior by the National Park Service, subject to the provisions of the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes", as amended.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN T. GARITY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3096) for the relief of John T. Garity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Georgia make some explanation of this bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. This is a bill to relieve a surety on a bond that was forfeited in the Federal court. The defendant was later apprehended after the surety had paid the sum of $2,500 on the forfeiture. The letter from the Attorney General states that that was more than sufficient to repay the Government for all expenses in court, and the Department of Justice recommends the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Whereas John T. Garity, of Savannah, Ga., became surety upon the supersedeas bond of Wilson Jenkins in the sum of $15,000 to secure the appearance of the said Wilson Jenkins pending a decision on a writ of appeal from the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States; and

Whereas said Wilson Jenkins failed to answer to the final judgment rendered in said case; and

Whereas the bond signed by the said John T. Garity as surety for the said Wilson Jenkins was forfeited and estreated; and

Whereas the said John T. Garity paid $2,500 in May 1933 on account of said forfeiture as part payment on said bond; and

Whereas the said Wilson Jenkins was apprehended on June 7, 1933, and then incarcerated in the Federal penitentiary in Atlanta, Ga., and is now in the custody and control of the prison authorities of the United States Government and is serving the sentence for which said bond signed by the said John T. Garity as surety was given for the appearance of said Wilson Jenkins; and

Whereas said $2,500 paid on said bond is more than sufficient to defray any expense incurred by the United States Government in connection with the apprehension of said Wilson Jenkins: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That John T. Garity be, and he is hereby, relieved from all further liability as surety on the supersedeas bond signed by said John T. Garity for the appearance of Wilson Jenkins pending a writ of error from the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit to answer to a sentence and final judgment which had been imposed by the United States District Court for the Southern District of Georgia, Savannah division, said bond dated March 29, 1930, and which sentence he is now serving.

The preamble was agreed to.

E. CLARENCE ICE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2619) for the relief of E. Clarence Ice, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000", and at the end of the bill to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to E. Clarence Ice, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000, in full settlement of all claims against the Government on account of the death of his son, Corp. Egbert J. Ice, who was killed August 15, 1933, while in the performance of his duties with the District of Columbia National Guard at Camp Albert C. Ritchie: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BERT MOORE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2272) for the relief of Bert Moore, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$5,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$2,500", and at the end of the bill to insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Bert Moore, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500 in full settlement of all claims for injuries sustained by reason of being shot and seriously wounded by a military guard at Fort Logan H. Roots on the night of April 23, 1925: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. O. MEYER

The bill (S. 3366) for the relief of C. O. Meyer was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to C. O. Meyer the sum of $297.68. Such sum represents the amount paid to C. O. Meyer as substitute carrier while he was postmaster at Meyers Mill, S.C., and which amount was charged by the Department to the account of C. O. Meyer.

JAMES B. CONNER

The bill (H.R. 3056) for the relief of James B. Conner, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNIE I. HISSEY

The bill (H.R. 1158) for the relief of Annie I. Hissey was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIP F. HAMBSCH

The bill (H.R. 1933) for the relief of Philip F. Hambsch was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. K. MORRIS

The bill (H.R. 2322) for the relief of C. K. Morris was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RUBY F. VOILES

The bill (H.R. 2438) for the relief of Ruby F. Voiles was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H.R. 3161) for the relief of Henry Harrison Griffith was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] explain that bill? Does the Department recommend it?

Mr. CAPPER. I will ask that the bill be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

H. A. SODERBERG

The bill (H.R. 7289) for the relief of H. A. Soderberg was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAMAGE TO PROPERTY AT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 2418) for the relief of certain claimants at Leavenworth, Kans., occasioned through damage to property inflicted by escaping prisoners, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, after the word "appropriated", to insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of Elizabeth Phillips, in the amount of $55; Joseph M. Kressin, in the amount of $63.30; Joseph Verlinde, in the amount of $4.95, all arising through damages to personal property occasioned by the escape of seven prisoners from the United States penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., on December 11, 1931. There is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $123.75, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of these claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EMERSON C. SALISBURY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 2414) for the relief of Emerson C. Salisbury, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after the words "pay to", to insert "Frank Salisbury, executor of the estate of"; and on line 5, after the name "Salisbury", to insert the word "deceased", and to strike out the words "of Leavenworth, Kans."; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Frank Salisbury, executor of the estate of Emerson C. Salisbury, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500, as full compensation for damages to his property on December 11, 1931, when three Federal prisoners escaped from the United States penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., and barricaded themselves in the house which was bombarded by the posse seeking the escaped prisoners: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will be glad if the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] will explain that bill.

Mr. CAPPER. It has to do with the escape of prisoners from Leavenworth Penitentiary. I read from the statement of facts:

In this case convicts escaped from the Leavenworth Penitentiary and, on December 11, 1931, barricaded themselves in the house of this claimant. While the claimant was in the house, the Leavenworth guards, sheriff, and soldiers lay siege to the house and filled it full of bullet holes. This continued for some hours. As a result, the roof of the house was riddled with bullet holes, the sides of the house were punctured with bullet holes in hundreds of places, the windows were broken, the plastering on the inside punctured and knocked off the walls, and other damage was done.

The case has been thoroughly investigated by Sanford Bates, and the report includes a favorable recommendation from Attorney General Mitchell, and also a favorable recommendation from Sanford Bates, who personally visited the property.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as I understand the case, some escaped convicts entrenched themselves in the home of the claimant, or in the house he was in possession of or occupied. Is there anything to indicate that they did so with his consent or approval?

Mr. CAPPER. Oh, no; not at all. On page 2 of the report will be found a very complete and comprehensive statement. Sanford Bates, the Director of Prisons, who visited the property, recommends that the loss, amounting to $1,500, be paid. The original claim was for $1,868, as shown on page 3 of the report, but the bill reduces that to $1,500, as recommended by the Attorney General in the report of February 26, 1932.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Frank Salisbury, executor of the estate of Emerson C. Salisbury, deceased."

R. A. HUNSINGER

The bill (H.R. 1977) for the relief of R. A. Hunsinger was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WHITE B. MILLER

The bill (H.R. 3295) for the relief of the estate of White B. Miller was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think there should be an explanation of this bill. The amount carried is $25,000.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, this is a bill to authorize the payment of that amount to the estate of White B. Miller, an attorney who was employed by the Government to represent it in most important tax litigation. I think, in the particular case, out of which this claim for a fee arose, the amount saved to the Government by the services of this attorney exceeded $1,000,000. The enactment of the proposed legislation is recommended by the Attorney General, and it seemed to the committee, in view of the high character of services rendered, in view of the large amount involved and the amount saved to the Government of the United States through the services rendered, and in view of the recommendation of the Attorney General himself, that the committee were justified in recommending the payment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Maine whether the special attorney was appointed without authority of law?

Mr. WHITE. I think there was no inhibition in law against his appointment, because there had been similar employment in other cases. Whether there was a specific and direct authorization for the employment or not I cannot answer, but I am very sure there was no inhibition against the employment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. KING. The fact is that Mr. Miller was an assistant to the Attorney General.

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. KING. He was receiving a salary of $10,000 a year. While so employed, this case, as many other cases, came to the Department of Justice. He was assigned to this case as any other attorney in the Department might have been assigned. It was his duty as assistant to the Attorney General to take over any cases that were assigned to him. I grant that his services were important. It was not indispensable, however, that he should have been named, and I think the deduction that because he was appointed the case was won is unwarranted. I shall object to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what I should like to know is whether an officer in the employ of the Government, who performs services for the Government, is to be compensated on the basis of recovery or success in the suits which he handles for the Government? If this man were a regular Assistant Attorney General, receiving a salary from the United States, I cannot understand, without some explanation, why he should not try the Government's law suits without charging large fees in addition to his salary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah withhold his objection?

Mr. KING. I withhold it for the moment. May I read part of the letter of the Attorney General, Mr. Mitchell, contained in the report:

> At the time of his appointment in the Cannon cases Mr. Miller was already receiving $10,000 a year, the maximum allowed under the law, as special assistant to the Attorney General for conducting the Haar cases at Savannah, Ga. He undertook the conduct of the Cannon litigation upon the urgent request of the Assistant Attorney General.

But he was receiving $10,000 a year as a special assistant.

Mr. WHITE. I think the Department itself recognizes that the practice is unusual, but it felt that this special attorney had been besought to handle these cases, and it involved a very great additional burden of work far beyond his routine employment as an assistant to the Attorney General. It involved months of investigation, and there is no doubt of the fact that he was assured extra compensation, and, further, there is no doubt that his services were of so high a character that the Government saved substantially over a million dollars in these tax cases. I think I have stated the facts as they are.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to read further from the Attorney General's report:

> As a result of Mr. Miller's employment, the Government retained $1,081,027.26, which represented one-half of the moneys in controversy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that implies that a compromise was entered into. That there was a suit for $2,000,000 plus, and settlement made under which one-half the amount claimed in the suit by the Government was realized. The point I am making is that it is quite a questionable practice, it seems to me, to retain as a special attorney one who is already charged with the responsibility and duty of handling such lawsuits, and then in addition to a large salary pay him a very large fee.

Mr. McKELLAR. My recollection of the facts is—I may be mistaken about them, for this incident happened a number of years ago—that Mr. Miller whether or not he was employed as salaried man, certainly was employed here as Assistant Attorney General and was also employed in Chattanooga in some capacity. I knew Mr. Miller very well. He was a very able lawyer, one of the best we had. He had been a very successful lawyer and succeeded wonderfully well with this lawsuit. He has since died. My recollection is that the Senate has passed a bill similar to this once or twice already, after an argument about it, and it seems to me that his estate is definitely entitled to the amount recommended by the committee.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. I would not quarrel with the general proposition laid down by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McKELLAR. Nor would I.

Mr. WHITE. It is sound as a general principle and rule, but I think it was felt by all who have given a study to this case that there were special circumstances. Certainly they were recognized by the Attorney General himself, who recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Here is what the report says, in part:

> At the time of his appointment in the Cannon cases Mr. Miller was already receiving $10,000 a year, the maximum allowed under the law, as special assistant to the Attorney General for conducting the Haar cases at Savannah, Ga. He undertook the conduct of the Cannon litigation upon the urgent request of the Assistant Attorney General in charge of tax matters and upon the assurance that every effort would be made to secure for him adequate compensation for this extra service in addition to that which he was receiving in the Haar cases. The Cannon cases involved as one of the parties the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Blair.

And so forth. Then it says:

In October 1928 a payment of $3,000 on account of the Cannon cases was made to Mr. Miller. On March 25, 1929, he submitted a claim for $50,000 for his services in those cases, which, allowing for the $3,000 theretofore paid on account, left $47,000 balance claimed by him.

That was the situation when the matter first came to my attention. We cannot make a practice of involving this Department in moral obligations to pay to special assistants more than the maximum compensation fixed by law. Yet I found that Mr. Miller had been given assurances when taking on this additional work that he would receive additional compensation and that a breach of good faith would result if we did not carry out these assurances.

Now, it appears that when he entered upon these cases he was already being paid the maximum amount which the law provided.

Mr. President, what is the use, what is the sense of fixing in the statute maximum salaries if the provisions of law are to be ignored by administrative officers of the Government? Under this arrangement executive departments could commit the Government morally, as the former Attorney General said, to any amount they chose, and then insist that, notwithstanding Congress had limited the amount that should be paid, there should be no limitation except that imposed by the discretion of the administrative or executive officer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I insist on my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

GEORGE B. BEAVER

The bill (H.R. 3300) for the relief of George B. Beaver was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN MERRILL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 3302) for the relief of John Merrill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $2,500 to John Merrill on account of gunshot wound received in left leg by a shot from a Federal prohibition enforcement officer, in the act of destroying a seized still, on July 19, 1930, in Polk County, Tenn., said Merrill being a deputy sheriff at the time and on a raid near Ocoee, Polk County, Tenn.: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may we have a justification for this proposal?

Mr. McKELLAR. The bill was reported from the committee by the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. I will ask the Senator from Tennessee to make the explanation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will take the facts from the report:

The Department of Justice interposes no objection to the enactment of this legislation.

The facts seem to be as follows:

The memorandum of February 27 states that "The files disclose that John Merrill was a deputy sheriff of Polk County, Tenn., and had no official connection with this Bureau or with the Government officers when he was injured." It is not disclosed whether the shot that wounded Merrill was fired by Bell or by another, and it is doubtful if that fact will ever be known.

The occurrence was investigated by Prohibition Agent J. O. Swafford, and his report is dated May 24, 1931. It describes the two parties, their approach to the still, etc., as shown in the memorandum of February 27, and also contains the following:

"Two of the party in which Mr. Merrill was opened fire on Agent Bell and his party, one bullet striking Deputy Copeland in the mouth, inflicting a slight wound, one bullet passing through Agent Bell's clothing between his left arm and body. Agent Bell and his party returned the fire, one bullet striking Mr. Merrill in the left leg near the knee and breaking his leg at the thigh * * *. Agent Bell and Deputy Copeland, being blinded by the flashlights of the other officers, returned the fire at the point where lights from the flash of guns appeared, Deputy Frazier firing from behind Mr. Merrill and he, being in the line of fire, received the wound."

This was a raiding party, and Mr. Merrill, it seems, who was a deputy sheriff, was shot through the leg and very seriously injured, and will be crippled, as stated in one affidavit, for life. He was fired on by a prohibition agent or some other member of the party who was making the raid. Under those circumstances it seems to me that the bill should properly be passed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, is it customary to compensate raiding parties for shooting one another up?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is that one of the objects of Federal legislation?

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, are prohibition officers who raid stills and send out State officers and let them direct their fire at one another to be paid for it?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what was done in this case.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. This officer, while he was a deputy sheriff of the State, was a part of the Federal group who were making the raid on this still. There were two groups.

Mr. McKELLAR. They were acting for the Government.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Merrill was acting for the Government and was crippled for life in the service. I think there are many precedents for legislation of this kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. During the prohibition era a great many bills of this character were passed.

Mr. WHITE. A great many bills of this character have been passed where a man has been severely hurt, and I think in this case it is perfectly clear that the proposed beneficiary of the bill is crippled for the remainder of his life.

Mr. McKELLAR. The record so states.

Mr. WHITE. The bill was recommended by the prohibition officials, and it seemed to the committee that its passage was warranted by the facts and by the precedents.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the bill will be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION OF WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this morning I asked whether or not it would be in order for me to move to discharge the Committee on Finance from the further consideration of House bill 1, which is the soldiers' bonus bill, which has been passed by the House. I am informed that a majority of the Senate are in favor of passing soldiers' bonus legislation if a vote could be had on the measure at this time without any serious difficulty, and it would not take much of the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Louisiana that under clause 3 of rule VII nothing is in order on Monday morning except the call of the calendar. The rule so specifies and states that that business cannot be laid aside for any other business.

Mr. LONG. I was not making a point of order. The point I am making is this, that if our party would permit a motion to discharge the Committee on Finance this morning, we could have a straight out vote on the soldiers' bonus bill. We are going to have to put this bill onto something else, and I apprehend that our leaders will then say that this bill ought not to be put on some other bill; but the way to avoid that would be this morning for us to be allowed unanimous consent to move to discharge the committee and vote on the bonus bill outright; otherwise we are going to have——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that such a motion was made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]; I myself raised the point of order that that motion was not in order, and the point of order was sustained. If the effort were repeated, I should make the same point of order.

Mr. LONG. That means, and I am just announcing it now, that apparently our only means of getting action on the soldiers' bonus bill, which is favored by a majority of the Senate, will be to pick up the bill and tack it on to some other bill. Apparently that is going to be our only recourse and our only means of getting action at this session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

EULA K. LEE

The bill (H.R. 4690) for the relief of Eula K. Lee was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE L. RULISON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3486) for the relief of George L. Rulison, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$909.07 as reimbursement" and insert in lieu thereof "$600, in full settlement of all claims against the Government", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to George L. Rulison, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $600, in full settlement of all claims against the Government, for expenditures made by said George L. Rulison between November 1, 1927, and July 1, 1928, for office rental and stenographic and other service in connection with the performance of his duties as United States attorney and as assistant United States attorney at South Bend, Ind.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who introduced the bill, as to the justification for the measure. I note that the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] reported the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the bill is in behalf of George L. Rulison. He was appointed United States district attorney in Indiana. He assumed the office and entered upon the performance of his duties. There was some delay on the part of the Government, as to the reason for which I am not advised, in providing him with the stenographic assistance and an office or other facilities for carrying on his duties as United States district attorney. For some substantial period of time he utilized his own law office, his own clerical force and stenographic force and all the other facilities of his own going office and of his partner in the performance of his duties as district attorney.

The bill seeks to reimburse him for that part of those expenses which are properly chargeable to his activities as United States district attorney. The bill is recommended by the Department. The claimant originally asked for something over $900. He indicated at one time he would be satisfied to take $600. The committee accepted that offer and inserted an amendment reducing the amount of the claim from something over $900 to $600.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NELLIE LAMSON

The bill (H.R. 7168) for making compensation to the estate of Nellie Lamson was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas subsequently said: Mr. President, a few moments ago, when House bill 7168 was called, it was passed over at my request. I ask unanimous consent to recur to it. Upon a reading of the report it appears that the claim is justified; and I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNA H. JONES

The bill (H.R. 2433) for the relief of Anna H. Jones was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. H. LE DUC

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 3307) for the relief of W. H. Le Duc.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what is the basis of the claim?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the report attached to the bill shows that $1,000 was improperly collected from a ship captain whose ship was taken to harbor without his consent. He was required to put up $1,000, which was afterward declared illegally collected. The bill merely provides for the return of the $1,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The explanation is satisfactory to me.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to W. H. Le Duc the sum of $1,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 percent per annum from the date of payment of fine or penalty, representing the amount deposited by him on account of a fine or penalty of $1,000 assessed against him and by him paid to the United States under protest at the port of Galveston on or about March 26, 1928, for alleged violation of the navigation laws: Provided, That such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States: Provided further, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

JOHN S. CATHCART

The bill (H.R. 2054) for the relief of John S. Cathcart was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. H. POWELL

The bill (H.R. 1943) for the relief of A. H. Powell was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RED RIVER BRIDGE, MINNESOTA-NORTH DAKOTA

The bill (S. 3491) authorizing the State Highway Departments of the States of Minnesota and North Dakota to construct, maintain, and operate certain free highway bridges across the Red River from Moorhead, Minn., to Fargo, N.Dak., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, there is on the calendar, an identical House bill, being order of business 1149. I move that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill and put upon its passage.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (H.R. 9502) authorizing the State Highway Departments of the States of Minnesota and North Dakota to construct, maintain, and operate certain free highway bridges across the Red River from Moorhead, Minn., to Fargo, N.Dak., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate bill S. 3491 will be indefinitely postponed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE, ST. LOUIS, MO.

The bill (S. 3493) to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act authorizing H. C. Brenner Realty and Finance Corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near a point between Cherokee and Osage Streets, St. Louis, Mo.", approved February 13, 1931, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing H. C. Brenner Realty and Finance Corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near a point between Cherokee and Osage Streets, St. Louis, Mo.", approved on February 13, 1931, be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted: Provided, That the construction herein authorized be commenced within 1 year and completed within 3 years from the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

PROMOTION OF CHIEF CLERK, RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE

The bill (S. 2868) to remove inequities in the law governing eligibility for promotion to the position of chief clerk in the Railway Mail Service, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], who introduced the bill, explain the changes that are proposed to be made by it in existing law.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, the bill was referred to and considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, inasmuch as it has to do entirely with those who have been in the Railway Mail Service for a number of years. Under the present law, before an individual employee may be promoted to chief clerk in charge, it is necessary that he shall serve for a period of 2 years continuously and without interruption.

For instance, an employee in the Railway Mail Service might have been in that service for a period, we will say, of 20 or 25 years, during which time from period to period he served as chief clerk for an aggregate or a total of 2 years; but regardless of the fact that he might have had the experience of 2 years of service as clerk in charge, he cannot under the law be promoted unless that service has been of a continuous nature and without interruption.

The only change the bill proposes to make in the present law is to change the continuous-service period from 2 years to 1 year.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, what is the position of the Department on the bill?

Mr. REYNOLDS. They have no objection to it. It has been taken up with several individual officials of the Post Office Department.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the Post Office Department officials particularly interested in the measure came before our committee urging very strongly the passage of the bill. They very strongly endorsed it.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In my folder there is no report on the bill from the Senate committee.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The Senator from Arkansas is entirely correct. In view of the fact that a report has not been filed, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky to make explanation of the situation to the Senator from Arkansas, if necessary. However, if I correctly understood, the Senator from Kentucky has just advised us that some of the officials of the Post Office Department appeared before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and not only recommended the passage of the bill, but, as a matter of fact, insisted upon its passage. Is not that correct?

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct.

There were a number of bills, probably 12 or 15, in which the Postmaster General himself and some of his assistants were interested. They came over and we checked the bills which they wanted passed, and this is one of the number they recommended. I am quite sure if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] were present at the moment he would corroborate what I have said about it I have stated my distinct remembrance.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That was my understanding; and that is why, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Arkansas, I mentioned the fact that it was my understanding that the officials of the Department were in favor of the bill and its passage had been recommended.

I may add that the real desire for the enactment of the measure is that the Post Office officials are put in a somewhat embarrassing situation from time to time when they are desirous of promoting an individual in the interest of the Service, and they are not permitted to do so because the law requires that his service as clerk in charge be of a continuous nature. I may add, further, for the information of the Senator from Arkansas, that in many instances men who have been in the Service for years upon years, and are thoroughly and perfectly qualified for promotion, are not permitted to have that promotion because of the fact that their service as clerks in charge has not been of a continuous nature. The statute, as at present written, requires that the person shall serve as clerk in charge continuously for 2 years; and while in many instances these persons have served for 4 or 5 years, their service has not been of a continuous nature.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I make no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That that part of section 7 of the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. 556), which comprises section 626 of title 39 of the United States Code, be amended to read as follows:

"Clerks in the highest grade in their respective lines or other assignments shall be eligible for promotion to positions of clerks in charge in said lines or corresponding position in other assignments; and clerks assigned as assistant chief clerks and clerks in grade 6, or higher rank, in their respective divisions, shall, after 1 year of continuous service in such capacity, be eligible for promotion to positions of chief clerks in said division for satisfactory, efficient, and faithful service, under such regulations as the Postmaster General shall prescribe."

RATES OF POSTAGE ON PERIODICALS

The bill (H.R. 5477) to fix the rates of postage on certain periodicals exceeding 8 ounces in weight was announced as next in order.

Mr. MCNARY. I should like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I suggest that the bill go over without prejudice until the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] returns.

Mr. MCNARY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MCKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, while I was absent from the Chamber a moment ago, Order of Business 1025, House bill 5477, to fix the rates of postage on certain periodicals exceeding 8 ounces in weight, I understand, was passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask that we may return to that order of business.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, the reason why it was passed over was that I asked for a brief explanation.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I so understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, the facts about this bill are disclosed in a letter from the Post Office Department, as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to extend to periodical publications of the character described in the bill the flat rate of 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof when weighing in excess of 8 ounces. Under existing law such publications exceeding 8 ounces in weight are subject to the fourth-class or parcel-post rates. These rates are in most instances prohibitive and prevent the publishers of periodicals of this kind preparing them so as to weigh more than 8 ounces, since no matter how slight the weight is in excess of 8 ounces under existing law postage must be paid for a full pound. The extension of the flat rate as proposed would enable these publishers to increase the weights of the copies of their publications and thus augment the postal revenues. Furthermore, it is believed that some publishers whose periodicals are entered as second-class matter will relinquish such entry and mail their publications under the conditions set forth in bill H.R. 5477 in order to be free from the restrictions placed by law on second-class matter. Additional revenue would result from such changes.

The Postmaster General then speaks of having had a cost ascertainment and says there will be great savings to the Department by reason of this change. The proposed legislation is desired by both the Department and those who are interested in the publications. The Department recommends the passage of the bill. It is one of the various measures which the Department sent to the Congress and asked to have enacted, so as to bring about savings to the Government.

Mr. FESS. Was there any division in the committee at all?

Mr. McKELLAR. None at all.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3544) to extend further the operation of an act of Congress approved January 26, 1933 (47 Stat. 776), entitled "An act relating to the deferment and adjustment of construction charges for the years 1931 and 1932 on Indian irrigation projects" was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, is the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] familiar with this bill? I should like to know for what it provides.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I shall have to admit that I do not remember the circumstances of the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I suggest that the bill go over without prejudice until the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] returns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

LUCILE A. ABBEY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1786) for the relief of Lucile A. Abbey, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That in the administration of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of Lucile A. Abbey in the same manner and to the same extent as if said Lucile A. Abbey had made application for the benefits of said act within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT ROOM

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S.Res. 193) authorizing that the room now occupied by the United States Supreme Court be preserved and kept open to the public, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules with amendments, on page 1, line 1, after the words "That the", to insert "court"; in line 2, after the words "in the", to strike out "Senate wing of the"; and in line 3, after the word "Court", to insert "and the space below it formerly a part of the court room"; so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the court room now occupied by the United States Supreme Court in the Capitol, when vacated by the Court, and the space below it formerly a part of the court room, shall be preserved and kept open to the public under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Architect of the Capitol with the approval of the Committee on Rules of the Senate.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am warmly in accord with the resolution, but I am wondering if it is limited to the Supreme Court room.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, Mr. President. This resolution, at my suggestion, has been modified by the committee to include the rooms below the present Supreme Court room, which for a long time were occupied by the United States Supreme Court. The latter rooms, now used for law library and similar purposes, have historical associations of very great interest and value. I was induced to suggest the amendment by lawyers of great renown, who are familiar with the history of the rooms and their use. I refer particularly to Mr. Nicholas Murray Butler and Mr. Charles Warren, and to a number of other prominent lawyers. I think the amendment is very desirable. Some time recently I had printed in the RECORD historical data respecting these rooms supplied me by Mr. Warren.

Mr. McNARY. I am very happy to be advised of the enlargement of the scope of the resolution, and I am quite satisfied to have it agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

JENNIE WALTON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2617) for the relief of the estate of Jennie Walton, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$5,450" and insert "$4,000", and in line 8, after the word "damages", to strike out the remainder of the bill and insert a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Jennie Walton, late of Bantry, N.Dak., the sum of $4,000, in full satisfaction of its claim against the United States for damages from an automobile accident on highway no. 5, near Belcourt, N.Dak., within the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation, on October 5, 1931.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this was a case where an automobile with several people in it was driving by an Indian school. It was shortly after the school closed at night. The superintendent blew his whistle and signaled for the automobile to stop. The driver of the car claimed that he did not understand the signal. He was not driving at excessive speed; there were no children near the road, and he kept going on. The superintendent got in his car and drove 2 or 3 miles, caught up to the driver, ran by him, and the situation was such that the man driving the car was run into the ditch, the car tipped over, and the woman was killed. She was the sister-in-law of the man driving the car.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Department recommend the bill?

Mr. FRAZIER. The Department recommended favorable action on the bill. It recommended a slight amendment, cutting down the amount to $4,000. The bill is for the benefit of the estate. There were two or three children.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MABEL S. PARKER

The bill (S. 2768) for the relief of Mabel S. Parker was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. That seems to be a somewhat similar bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. No; this is a bill of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. It is simply to pay the transportation of an automobile and some other things on a transfer from Arizona to Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And approved before shipment by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that an exactly similar bill was passed on March 29, and is now on the House Calendar.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask that the bill be returned to the calendar until I can investigate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator asks unanimous consent that the bill be temporarily passed over. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3514) to provide for the enrollment of members of the Menominee Indian Tribe of the State of Wisconsin was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have a statement regarding that bill from the Senator from North Dakota? Were the two amendments suggested by the Department put in the bill?

Mr. FRAZIER. I understand that they were.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Department recommends two amendments; but, so far as I can find, they do not appear in the bill. It may be that they do. Let the bill go over for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3515) to amend the law relating to timber operations on the Menominee Indian Reservation in Wisconsin was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think we should have some explanation of that bill. I do not see the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in the Chamber. Let it go over for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over for the day.

RETIREMENT SYSTEM FOR RAILROAD EMPLOYEES

The bill (S. 3231) to provide a retirement system for railroad employees, to provide unemployment relief, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, personally, I have no objection to this bill; but I have been requested by two Members of the Senate, who are necessarily absent, to have it go over for the day.

Mr. McKELLAR. There does not seem to be a report on the bill, either.

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes; there is a very complete report.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; there is a report.

Mr. McKELLAR. There does not seem to be one in my file.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] if he is insisting upon his objection to Senate bill 3231?

Mr. McNARY. I desire again to advise the Senator that, personally, I have no objection to the bill. I favor the proposed legislation; but two Members of the Senate have asked me in their absence to have it passed over without prejudice, and I am doing so in their behalf.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am very much interested in this bill, as is the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. This is a general retirement pension bill for railway employees, and I trust that in the very near future we may have an opportunity to have the bill considered and passed.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to assure the Senator of my fairness in the matter. I shall not again object in behalf of any absentee Senator.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to say that for several years this bill has been a bone of contention among the railroad employees. We finally have succeeded in getting all factions together. It will not cost the Government a single dollar. It is a most remarkable plan; and I am extremely anxious that at an early date the bill may be considered and passed.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, there is a concordance of opinion, and all railway employees throughout the land are supporting this legislation.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I have some objection. I am not sure whether or not it is to this particular bill, because nearly all of the large railroads have already entered upon this plan of retirement, but the opposition comes from the smaller roads, which cannot make the contributions necessary. Is this the bill to which that opposition is presented?

Mr. HATFIELD. I may say to the Senator from Ohio that this is the bill which was perfected from the original bill, and for the purposes of the bill it makes all railway groups one group.

Mr. FESS. I am in favor of the principle, but I wondered whether the opposition was to this bill or to some other bill.

Mr. HATFIELD. I do not know the attitude of the railway organizations at the present time, since the perfection of the bill, but there have been a great number of changes. In fact, some of the larger trunk railways of this country today are paying about the same amounts into a fund for the retirement of their aged employees that this bill would require.

Mr. FESS. I understood that 0.9 of them were doing it.

Mr. HATFIELD. I may say to the able Senator from Ohio I cannot say as to the exact percentage.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Ohio is mistaken when he says that 0.9 of them have such a system, but even if it were so, it is a system which could be terminated at any time if the railway organizations decided to do so. There is no definite obligation on the railroads to continue the payment of the pensions.

I hope the bill will be acted upon at a very early date. I know of no opposition to it. All the different groups which had various opinions about the bill which the Senator from West Virginia and I originally introduced are now in accord in supporting the proposed legislation. I think that after a brief explanation it would be passed practically unanimously. So I join with the Senator in hoping that at a very early date we may act upon the bill in this body, so that it may pass both Houses in time to become a law. In view of the unanimity of opinion, it would be very unfortunate if, because of the congestion of the calendar, we were unable to reach the bill and have it enacted.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I share the view of the eminent Senator from New York, but when a Senator is necessarily absent, and asks me to represent him and object, I must do so. It is a duty I must perform.

Mr. WAGNER. I am sure the Senator will cooperate with us in getting consideration of the bill at an early date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being objection, the bill will be passed over.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE, OREGON

The bill (S. 3502) authorizing the Oregon-Washington Bridge Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Columbia River at or near Astoria, Oreg., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Oregon-Washington Bridge Commission (hereinafter created, and hereinafter referred to as the "commission") and its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River at or near the city of Astoria, Oreg., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act. Such commission is further authorized and directed to acquire all the assets and liabilities of the Rivers Improvement Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Oregon.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the commission and its successors and assigns the right and power to enter upon such lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use such real estate and other property in the States of Oregon and Washington as may be needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation of private property for public purposes in said States, respectively.

SEC. 3. The commission and its successors and assigns are hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. The commission and its successors and assigns are hereby authorized to provide for the payment of the cost of the bridge and its approaches and the necessary lands, easements, and appurtenances thereto by an issue or issues of negotiable bonds of the commission, bearing interest at not more than 6 percent per annum, the principal and interest of which bonds and any premium to be paid for retirement thereof before maturity shall be payable solely from the sinking fund provided in accordance with this act. Such bonds may be registrable as to principal alone or both principal and interest, shall be in such form not inconsistent with this act, shall mature at such time or times not exceeding 25 years from their respective dates, shall be in such denominations, shall be executed in such manner, and shall be payable in such medium and at such place or places as the commission may determine. The commission may repurchase and may reserve the right to redeem all or any of said bonds before maturity in such manner and at such price or prices, not exceeding 105 and accrued interest, as may be fixed by the commission prior to the issuance of the bonds. The commission may enter into an agreement with any bank or trust company in the United States as trustee having the power to make such agreement, setting forth the duties of the commission in respect of the construction, maintenance, operation, repair, and insurance of the bridge, the conservation and application of all funds, the safeguarding of moneys on hand or on deposit, and the rights and remedies of said trustee and the holders of the bonds, restricting the individual right of action of the bondholders as is customary in trust agreements respecting bonds of corporations. Such trust agreement may contain such provisions for protecting and enforcing the rights and remedies of the trustee and the bondholders as may be reasonable and proper and not inconsistent with the law and also provisions for approval by the original purchasers of the bonds of the employment of consulting engineers and of the security given by the bridge contractors and by any bank or trust company in which the proceeds of bonds or of bridge tolls or other moneys of the commission shall be deposited, and may provide that no contract for construction shall be made without the approval of the consulting engineers. The bridge constructed under the authority of this act shall be deemed an instrumentality for interstate commerce, the Postal Service, and military and other purposes authorized by the Government of the United States. Said bonds shall be sold in such manner and at such time or times and at such price as the commission may determine, but no such sale shall be made at a price so low as to require the payment of more than 6-percent interest on the money received therefor, computed with relation to the absolute maturity of the bonds in accordance with standard tables of bond values, and the face amount thereof shall be so calculated as to produce, at the price of their sale, the cost of the bridge and its approaches, and the land, easements, and appurtenances used in connection therewith. The cost of the bridge shall be deemed to include interest during construction of the bridge, and for 12 months thereafter, and all engineering, legal, architectural, traffic surveying, and other expenses incident to the construction of the bridge and the acquisition of the necessary property, and incident to the financing thereof, including the cost of acquiring existing franchises, rights, plans, and works of and relating to the bridge, now owned by any person, firm, or corporation, and the cost of purchasing all or any part of the shares of stock of any such corporate owner if, in the judgment of the commission, such purchases should be found expedient. If the proceeds of the bonds issued shall exceed the cost as finally determined, the excess shall be placed in the sinking fund hereinafter provided. Prior to the preparation of definitive bonds the commission may, under like restrictions, issue temporary bonds or interim certificates with or without coupons of any denomination whatsoever, exchangeable for definitive bonds when such bonds have been executed and are available for delivery.

SEC. 5. In fixing the rates of toll to be charged for the use of such bridge, the same shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to pay the principal and interest of such bonds as the same shall fall due and the redemption or repurchase price of all or any thereof redeemed or repurchased before maturity, as herein provided. All tolls and other revenues from said bridge are hereby pledged to such uses and to the application thereof as hereinafter in this section required. After payment or provision for payment therefrom of all such cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating, and the reservation of an amount of money estimated to be sufficient for the same purpose during an ensuing period of not more than 6 months, the remainder of tolls collected shall be placed in the sinking fund, at intervals to be determined by the commission prior to the issuance of the bonds. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested. The commission shall classify in a reasonable way all traffic over the bridge, so that the tolls shall be so fixed and adjusted by it as to be uniform in the application thereof to all traffic falling within any such reasonable class, regardless of the status or character of any person, firm, or corporation participating in such traffic, and shall prevent all use of such bridge for traffic except upon payment of the tolls so fixed and adjusted. No toll shall be charged officials or employees of the commission or of the Government of the United States or any State, county, or municipality in the United States while in the discharge of their duties.

SEC. 6. After payment of the bonds and interest, or after a sinking fund sufficient for such payment shall have been provided and shall be held for that purpose, the commission shall deliver deeds or other suitable instruments of conveyance of the interest of the commission in and to the bridge, that part within Oregon to the State of Oregon or any municipality or agency thereof as may be authorized by or pursuant to law to accept the same (hereinafter referred to as the "Oregon interests") and that part within Washington to the State of Washington or any municipality or agency thereof as may be authorized by or pursuant to law to accept the same (hereinafter referred to as the "Washington interests"), under the condition that the bridge shall thereafter be free of tolls and be properly maintained, operated, and repaired by the Oregon interests and the Washington interests, as may be agreed upon; but if either the Oregon interests or the Washington interests shall not be authorized to accept or shall not accept the same under such conditions, then the bridge shall continue to be owned, maintained, operated, and repaired by the commission, and the rates of tolls shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management, until such time as both the Oregon interests and the Washington interests shall be authorized to accept and shall accept such conveyance under such conditions.

SEC. 7. For the purpose of carrying into effect the objects stated in this act, there is hereby created the Oregon-Washington Bridge Commission, and by that name, style, and title said body shall have perpetual succession; may contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, complain, and defend in all courts of law and equity; may make and have a common seal; may purchase or otherwise acquire and hold or dispose of real estate and other property; may accept and receive donations and gifts of money or other property and apply same to the purposes of this act; and shall have and possess all powers necessary, convenient, or proper for carrying into effect the objects stated in this act.

The commission shall consist of Guy Boyington, A. W. Norblad, and M. R. Chessman, all of the city of Astoria, Oreg., and L. D. Williams and O. H. Roessler, of Pacific County, Wash. Such commission shall be a body corporate and politic. Each member of the commission shall qualify within 30 days after the approval of this act by filing in the office of the Secretary of the Interior an oath that he will faithfully perform the duties imposed upon him by this act, and each person appointed to fill a vacancy shall qualify in like manner within 30 days after his appointment. Any vacancy occurring in said commission by reason of failure to qualify as above provided, or by reason of death or resignation, shall be filled by the Secretary of the Interior. Before the issuance of bonds as hereinabove provided, each member of the commission shall give such bond as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, conditioned upon the faithful performance of all duties required by this act. The commission shall elect a chairman and a vice chairman from its members, and may establish rules and regulations for the government of its own business. A majority of the members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

SEC. 8. The commission shall have no capital stock or shares of interest or participation, and all revenues and receipts thereof shall be applied to the purposes specified in this act. The members of the commission shall be entitled to a per diem compensation for their services of $10 for each day actually spent in the business of the commission, but the maximum compensation of the chairman in any year shall not exceed $2,500 and of each other member shall not exceed $500. The members of the commission shall also be entitled to receive traveling-expense allowance of 10 cents a mile for each mile actually traveled on the business of the commission. The commission may employ a secretary, treasurer, engineers, attorneys, and such other experts, assistants, and employees as they may deem necessary, who shall be entitled to receive such compensation as the commission may determine. All salaries and expenses shall be paid solely from the funds provided under the authority of this act. After all bonds and interest thereon shall have been paid and all other obligations of the commission paid or discharged or provision for all such payment shall have been made as hereinbefore provided, and after the bridge shall have been conveyed to the Oregon interests and the Washington interests as herein provided, the commission shall be dissolved and shall cease to have further existence by an order of the Secretary of the Interior made upon his own initiative or upon application of the commission or any member or members thereof, but only after a public hearing in the city of Astoria, Oreg., notice of the time and place of which hearing and the purpose thereof shall have been published once, at least 30 days before the date thereof, in a newspaper published in the city of Astoria, Oreg., and a newspaper published in South Bend, Wash. At the time of such dissolution all moneys in the hands of or to the credit of the commission shall be divided into two equal parts, one of which shall be paid to said Oregon interests and the other to said Washington interests.

SEC. 9. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize or permit the commission or any member thereof to create any obligation or incur any liability other than such obligations and liabilities as are dischargeable solely from funds provided by this act. No obligation created or liability incurred pursuant to this act shall be an obligation or liability of any member or members of the commission, but shall be chargeable solely to the funds herein provided, nor shall any indebtedness created pursuant to this act be an indebtedness of the United States.

SEC. 10. All provisions of this act may be enforced, or the violation thereof prevented, by mandamus, injunction, or other appropriate remedy brought by the attorney general for the State of Oregon, the attorney general for the State of Washington, or the United States district attorney for any district in which the bridge may be located in part, in any court having competent jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties.

SEC. 11. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

SEC. 12. Section 1 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of other bridges over the navigable waters of the United States", approved June 10, 1930, as amended, is hereby repealed.

CHIPPEWA INDIAN TREATIES

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate return to Order of Business 917, the bill (S. 2980) to modify the effect of certain Chippewa Indian treaties on areas in Minnesota. The Senator from Tennessee tells me he has no objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of Order of Business 917. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask that the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and passed be reconsidered, and that the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; the votes are reconsidered, and the bill is before the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I submit an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment to the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee, on page 2, line 1, after the word "treaties", by striking out "Provided, That the Indian liquor laws shall continue to be in force on all Indian reservations or other lands owned or hereafter acquired by Indian tribes, or by the United States Government for the use or benefit of Indians or for the administration of Indian affairs; on individual Indian allotments or other individual Indian-owned lands while the title to same is held in trust by the United States or while the same shall remain inalienable by the Indian without the consent of some governmental officer; and on all other lands within the exterior borders of Indian reservations: Provided further"; in line 11, before the word "That", to insert "Provided"; in the same line, after the word "That", to insert "in that portion in the said State of Minnesota affected by this act"; and in line 14, after the figures "1897", to insert a comma; and in the same line, after the figures "506" and the parenthesis, to insert "and to the manufacture or sale of liquors on individual Indian allotments or other individual Indian-owned lands while the title to same is held in trust by the United States or while the same shall remain inalienably by the Indian without the consent of some governmental officer", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act lands in Minnesota ceded to the United States by the treaty of September 30, 1854 (10 Stat.L. 1109), between the United States and the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior and the Mississippi and by the treaty of February 22, 1855 (10 Stat.L. 1165), between the United States and the Mississippi Bands of Chippewa Indians, shall no longer be considered as "Indian country" for the purposes of article 7 of said treaties: Provided, That in that portion in the said State of Minnesota affected by this act the Indian liquor laws shall continue to apply to the sale, gift, barter, exchange, etc., of liquors to ward Indians of the classes set forth in the act of January 30, 1897 (29 Stat.L. 506), and to the manufacture or sale of liquors on individual Indian allotments or other individual Indian-owned lands while the title to same is held in trust by the United States or while the same shall remain inalienably by the Indian without the consent of some governmental officer.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desired to ask the Senator whether this had the approval of the committee and the approval of Mr. Collier.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

LEASING OF COAL LANDS IN ALASKA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 6179) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation from the Senator from New York of this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York does not seem to be in the Chamber.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see by the report that the Department has recommended the bill, and I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RANSOME COOYATE

The bill (S. 2906) for the relief of Ransome Cooyate was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000 to Ransome Cooyate, of the Zuni Reservation in New Mexico, in full satisfaction of his claim for injuries received while a student at the Albuquerque Boarding School, New Mexico: Provided, That in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, the amount herein appropriated may be held as individual Indian money by the Superintendent of the Zuni Agency, N.Mex., and disbursed to the beneficiary at the rate of $30 a month.

COLLIER MANUFACTURING CO.

The bill (S. 2242) for the relief of the Collier Manufacturing Co., of Barnesville, Ga., was announced as next in order.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this bill covers a case, the facts of which are as follows: The Collier Manufacturing Co. was approached during the war and asked to manufacture certain knit underwear for use by the soldiers. An agreement was reached between the Government and the Collier Manufacturing Co., but when the first contract was about to be made, the contract was taken in the name of a firm of New York brokers, who were merely acting as the sales agents of the Collier Manufacturing Co. Other contracts were made under similar circumstances.

Subsequently the contract in question was terminated because the war was about to end. The items of damage and the specifications in the account, I believe, are clearly beyond dispute. The whole question is whether or not this bill should pass, because the contract was not made with the Collier Manufacturing Co., but was made through its sales agents, who already had given the bond required by the Government and were in position to proceed with the execution of the contract.

The claim was first presented to the Board of Contract Adjustment in the War Department, and was denied because the Collier Manufacturing Co. was not a party to the contract. The Secretary of War sustained that decision upon the same grounds; the case went to the court of appeals, and the court of appeals denied recovery upon the same ground.

The Collier Manufacturing Co. were not strangers to this contract. The contract provided that the particular knit underwear should be manufactured by the Collier Manufacturing Co. The Collier Manufacturing Co. did manufacture the knit underwear and deliveries were made directly to the quartermaster depot in Atlanta, Ga., the manufacturing plant of the Collier Manufacturing Co. being located in a nearby town.

It seems to the committee, and to me, after looking into the facts very carefully, that this is an entirely just claim, and should not be denied upon the purely technical ground that the Collier Manufacturing Co. were not parties to the contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. The court of appeals did not decide that it was not a just claim, but merely held that the complainant did not have a right to maintain an action. Is that correct?

Mr. GEORGE. That there were no contractual relations between the Collier Manufacturing Co. and the Government; but they were the sole beneficiaries of the contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did the Government get the benefit of the goods? Were they delivered to the Government and used by the Government?

Mr. GEORGE. Portions of the goods were delivered to the Government, and the entire contract was made between the manufacturing company and representatives of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$61,530.02" and to insert in lieu thereof "$48,719.70"; on line 7, after the word "appropriated", to strike out the words "the same being the actual", and to insert in lieu thereof the words "in full settlement of all claims against the Government for"; and on line 9, after the words "account of", to strike out the words "the cancelation of a contract for"; and to add a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Collier Manufacturing Co., of Barnesville, Ga., the sum of $48,719.70, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full settlement of all claims against the Government for losses sustained by said Collier Manufacturing Co. on account of the manufacture of undershirts for the United States Army in the year 1918: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF SAN CARLOS ACT

The bill (S. 2928) to amend the act of Congress approved June 7, 1924, commonly called the "San Carlos Act" and acts supplementary thereto, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). This bill is identical with House bill 8938, Order of Business 1143.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 8938) to amend the act of Congress approved June 7, 1924, commonly called the "San Carlos Act", and acts supplementary thereto, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved June 7, 1924 (43 Stat.L. 475, 476), commonly called the "San Carlos Act", and acts supplementary thereto, including the act of Congress approved March 7, 1928 (45 Stat.L. 210–212), and acts supplementary thereto, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to provide that the construction cost of the San Carlos project, including the cost of the power development at the Coolidge Dam and the transmission line or lines shall be repaid without interest, and that part thereof to be paid on account of the lands in public or private ownership shall be repaid in 40 equal annual installments beginning on December 1, 1935, the date fixed by the public notice heretofore issued by the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the San Carlos Irrigation and Drainage District, is hereby authorized to modify the existing repayment contract in accordance herewith.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question with reference to the bill. What is the purpose of modifying these contracts in this way? We have existing contracts that evidently are favorable to the Indians. In what respect are they to be modified unfavorably to the Indians?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the bill does not affect the Indians at all. This is a project of 100,000 acres, half Indian lands and half white lands. The white landowner is required under the existing contracts to pay 4 percent interest on the money invested in the project. That was provided at the time when cotton was worth 20 cents a pound and alfalfa hay was worth $16 a ton. Now, however, cotton has gone down and hay has gone down, and the landowners cannot pay this interest.

This is the only project in the United States where there is an interest charge. In order that the landowners may take advantage of the Federal Farm Loan Act the Department has recommended the enactment of this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. What does the bill do?

Mr. HAYDEN. It removes the interest charge of 4 percent.

Mr. McKELLAR. All of it?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The bill, however, requires the landowners to pay the principal?

Mr. HAYDEN. It requires them to pay the principal, just as on all other reclamation projects.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know much about these matters, Mr. President, but it seems to me the Government has already done a great deal in creating the reclamation projects, and it seems to me the landowners ought to pay some interest.

Mr. HAYDEN. This is the only project in the United States where an interest charge is made. This measure will put these landowners on a parity with all the others.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are the Indians put on a parity with the whites?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Indians do not pay anything at all until the land passes out of their ownership.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 2928 will be indefinitely postponed.

QUINAULT INDIAN RESERVATION

The bill (H.R. 8494) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to modify the terms of existing contracts for the sale of timber of the Quinault Indian Reservation when it is in the interest of the Indians so to do was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President may we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this bill as originally introduced in the House provided that the contracts might be modified. I was asked to introduce a similar bill in the Senate. I refused to do so. I took the position that the contracts should be open for competitive bidding. I found that the Bureau of Indian Affairs had approved legislation permitting a reduction of the price of stumpage to the Indians of the Klamath Reservation, in Oregon. I still did not believe that similar legislation should be passed as to any other reservation. I learned, however, that the company which wants to have its contract modified has a private railway running into this Indian timber reservation, and that it is willing to make that private railroad a common carrier, and thereby probably make it possible for the other bidders for Indian timber in the future, and others who want to use the road, to pay hereafter a larger amount to the Indians. The Indians themselves are quite anxious to have the bill enacted.

So the House bill includes a section, known as "section 4", which provides that the railroad that is now asking for this relief shall become a common carrier. To that extent the passage of the bill would benefit the entire community by opening the road to service, and make it quite possible that the Indians will receive a larger payment for timber they may sell in the future from the reservation.

For that reason I urged the committee to report this bill favorably.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that when we were first discussing Indian questions upon several occasions, the fact was developed that many of the contractors who had obtained permits and contracts to go upon the Indian reservations and cut down timber were postponing, in violation of the terms of the contracts, the cutting of the timber, and were seeking in every possible way to secure modification of the contracts, because they wanted to pay the Indians less than they were entitled to receive under the contracts. Many of the Indians complained to me of the wrong which would be perpetrated if that course were pursued. I desire to be assured by the Senator that under this bill no such wrong may be perpetrated with respect to the Indians who are involved.

Mr. DILL. I made a very close study of this situation. This particular railroad is paying about $5 a thousand for stumpage, as compared with $2 and $3 paid by the other contractors. In view of the fact that the railroad will be made a common carrier, and in view of the probable benefits that will result to the Indians from that, it seems to me that the bill may well be enacted.

Mr. KING. I shall not object; but if, after further investigation, upon the morrow I find that, in my judgment, this proposed legislation is improvident and unfair to the Indians, I shall ask for a reconsideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHIEF CLERK IN THE RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have just learned that there is on the calendar for consideration today House bill 7343, Order of Business 1236, to remove inequities in the law governing eligibility for promotion to the position of Chief Clerk in the Railway Mail Service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, we have not yet reached that.

Mr. REYNOLDS. No; so I understand, but I desire to bring the matter to the attention of the Senate. The House bill is identical with the bill I introduced, Senate bill 2868, which was passed earlier today. I desire to ask that House bill 7343 be substituted for Senate bill 2868, in view of the fact that the House bill has passed the House; and I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 2868 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read, so we may know what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (H.R. 7343) to remove inequities in the law governing eligibility for promotion to the position of Chief Clerk in the Railway Mail Service.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the calendar number?

Mr. REYNOLDS. It is Order of Business No. 1236.

I may state, for the information of the Senator from Utah, that this matter was discussed this morning, at which time the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] explained to this body that representatives of the Post Office Department had appeared before the committee and recommended the passage of the bill. I am merely asking that the House bill be substituted for my bill, the House bill having already passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. KING. I was called out of the Chamber to go to the Supreme Court for a few moments, and during my absence this bill apparently was under consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. The House bill has not yet been reached on the calendar; but I have no objection whatever to taking the course the Senator from North Carolina suggests.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I understand that the House bill has already passed the House.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it has passed the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 7343) to remove inequities in the law governing eligibility for promotion to the position of Chief Clerk in the Railway Mail Service, which was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which Senate bill 2868 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and passed will be reconsidered, and the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

CROW INDIAN TRIBAL COUNCIL

The bill (S. 2888) to provide for expenses of the Crow Indian Tribal Council and authorized delegates of the tribe was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend $5,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, of the funds standing to the credit of the Crow Indians in the Treasury of the United States for expenses of the Crow Indian Tribal Council and authorized delegates of the tribe.

INDIANS OF FORT PECK RESERVATION, MONT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2889) for the relief of certain Indians of the Fort Peck Reservation, Mont., which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-named Indians of the Fort Peck Reservation the amounts herein set forth: James Black Dog, $185; Archie Red Elk, $25; Catherine Medicine Walk and Belle Medicine Walk, $25; James Garfield, $70; Nancy Titus, $35; and Carl W. Eagle, administrator of the estate of Charles Peterson, $25; the above sums representing funds collected for the Indians named but misapplied by a former employee of the Indian Service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether the employee of the Government who embezzled the funds of the Indians was prosecuted or whether he was under bond, and, if not, why not. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but I may move to reconsider it upon further consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

N. LESTER TROAST

The bill (S. 2918) for the relief of N. Lester Troast was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $144.28 to N. Lester Troast, of Juneau, Alaska, in full settlement of expenses incurred by him under official orders in connection with the use of his personally owned automobile on official business at Wrangell, Alaska, while supervising the construction of an Indian boarding school at that place.

EXCHANGE OF SEMINOLE INDIAN LANDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3286) authorizing the exchange of the lands reserved for the Seminole Indians in Florida for other lands, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to exchange lands in the State of Florida reserved for the Seminole Indians by Executive order of June 28, 1911, or purchased for said Indians, or any part thereof, for lands owned by the State of Florida. Upon conveyance to the United States by the State of Florida of a sufficient title to the lands to be acquired for the use of the Seminole Indians, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue a patent in fee or to make other proper conveyance to the State of Florida covering the lands granted in exchange.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] tell us the purposes of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. This bill was suggested by the Indian Bureau, and covers a situation such as I shall describe.

The Seminoles had grants from the Federal Government of so many acres of land, and also from the State government. Instead of occupying those lands, they have gone out and settled upon other lands adjacent to them. Without going to the trouble of compelling them to live on their own reservation, this bill authorizes the exchange of lands, which is for the real benefit of the Seminoles themselves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE, NEW YORK

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I understand we are to stop considering bills on the calendar at 2 o'clock. I ask the Senate to bear with me to enable me to ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 3641, which is a bridge bill to permit an extension of time; and in this case time is the essence. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3641) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y., which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y., authorized to be built by the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission by an act of Congress approved June 14, 1933, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 14, 1934.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 1757. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Mount Olivet Cemetery Co., in the District of Columbia";

S. 2580. An act to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society, United States Daughters of 1812, in the District of Columbia; and

S. 3442. An act to dissolve the Ellen Wilson Memorial Home.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 3487) relating to direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve banks, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. STEAGALL, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. PRALL, Mr. LUCE, and Mr. BEEDY were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H.R. 2837. An act to provide for the establishment of the Everglades National Park in the State of Florida, and for other purposes; and

H.J.Res. 347. Joint resolution to prohibit the sale of arms or munitions of war in the United States under certain conditions.

PROCESSING TAX ON PHILIPPINE COCONUT OIL (H.DOC. NO. 388)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Early in the present session of the Congress the Philippine Independence Act was passed. This act provided that after the inauguration of the new interim or commonwealth form of government of the Philippine Islands trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be as now provided by law. Certain exceptions, however, were made. One of these exceptions required levying on all coconut oil coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 448,000,000 pounds, the same rates of duty now collected by the United States on coconut oil imported from foreign countries.

It is, of course, wholly clear that the intent of the Congress by this provision was to exempt from import duty 448,000,000 pounds of coconut oil from the Philippines.

Later in the present session the Congress, in the revenue act, imposed a 3-cent-per-pound processing tax on coconut oil from the Philippines. This action was, of course, directly contrary to the intent of the provision in the independence act cited above.

During this same period the people of the Philippine Islands, through their legislature, accepted the provisions of the independence act on May 1, 1934.

There are three reasons why I request reconsideration by the Congress of the provision for a 3-cent-per-pound processing tax:

First. It is a withdrawal of an offer made by the Congress of the United States to the people of the Philippine Islands.

Second. Enforcement of this provision at this time will produce a serious condition among many thousands of families in the Philippine Islands.

Third. No effort has been made to work out some form of compromise which would be less unjust to the Philippine people and at the same time attain, even if more slowly, the object of helping the butter- and animal-fat industry in the United States.

I, therefore, request reconsideration of that provision of the revenue act which relates to coconut oil in order that the subject may be studied further between now and next January, and in order that the spirit and intent of the independence act be more closely followed.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 28, 1934.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the message be referred to the Finance Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the message will be so referred.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, while the Senate is organizing itself for the day, and there are still a fair number of Democrats present, I wish to introduce what I have to say by telling them that I enjoyed the hospitality last night of one of the high priests of the Democratic Party, and one of the fine things he did for me was to present to me as a little souvenir of that delightful entertainment a speech which he had found in a bookshop somewhere, entitled "Speech of Mr. Collamer, of Vermont." This speech was made about a hundred years ago in the House of Representatives, and that distinguished Vermonter introduced himself to the House in an interesting manner. I make no individious comparison in submitting his introductory statement to the Senate, but I read it for the purpose of showing that even so long ago as a century, the real resort for sanctuary against unconstitutional measures was the vote of the people of the United States.

Mr. Collamer was about to discuss the tariff. There was pending in the House a bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means proposing to reduce the duties on imports, being under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. Collamer said:

Mr. Chairman, I am sensible that speeches in this House, on the great subjects of national policy, are generally, for all the purposes of legitimate discussion, that is, to persuade and convince the hearer, of little or no use. I shall, therefore, not attempt to command attention by a forced elevation of voice, but so speak as that all may hear me who desire so to do, and I do not expect the attention of those who will not hear.

Mr. President, I oppose the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, and I will discuss briefly two grounds of opposition:

First. That the power proposed to be granted to the President is forbidden by the people.

Second. That the policy of the proposed act is unsound.

The powers to be granted by the proposed act must be considered to be as extensive as the authority expressed and implied.

In the main the bill would grant to the President authority to do things which the people of the United States have required Congress exclusively to do, namely, to legislate, to levy taxes, and to regulate international commerce.

It also proposes to authorize the President to make treaties without ratification by the Senate, which is an authority not granted by the sovereign power.

The stated primary use of the power to levy duties is for the purpose of regulating foreign trade and to neutralize discriminatory treatment of American commerce, but it also is aimed at "other acts or policies which in his—the President's—opinion tend to defeat the purposes set forth" in the bill.

The declared objective is the expansion of foreign markets for products of the United States.

The treaty-making power is contained in the clause:

(1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof.

The legislative power of taxation is contained in the provision:

(2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. * * *

This legislative power is amplified in clause (c) to include rate, form of import duty, and classification of articles, as well as limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties.

There is in the proposed law a limitation to the effect that—

No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists.

The authority is limited in time to 3 years for its exercise, and the duration of the treaties is not less than 3 years from the date on which they go into force. Due notice must be given for termination, which shall be not more than 6 months in advance. Therefore it is just a matter of mathematical calculation to determine that the proposed treaties must be of a duration of 3 years and 6 months at least.

The reciprocal clauses of the Tariff Act of 1930 providing for defense duties and exemptions are repealed, and the flexible feature of that act is inhibited from application to any article with respect to which a treaty has been concluded under the proposed act.

With this brief introductory explanation of the scope of the proposed act, I now proceed to a discussion of the first proposition, namely, that the power proposed to be granted to the President is forbidden by the people.

Mr. President, we are at the parting of the ways. On the right is the well-beaten path of the Constitution, the way of the law; on the left is that hard way of the transgressor, the way of unconstitutionality, the way of beating the law or breaking the law or evading the law; and when I speak of the law, I mean, of course, the fundamental law. We are at that split in the way, and we take our choice by our vote on this bill; we elect positively and absolutely which way we will follow.

First, the power proposed to be granted to the President is forbidden by the people. Under the proposed act the President has the power to answer the question, What change of rate of duty on any article imported from all countries ought to be made in consideration of a change by one nation, say, by Czechoslovakia, of rate of duty on any one article exported by us to Czechoslovakia?

The great markets of the United States—a continent—thereby would be opened to the whole world so far as that article is concerned, in consideration for what? For the market of a country which is not as large as one of several of our individual States.

Answering this question would be legislating. It would be making the law. It would not be applying the law. It would not be applying a rule such as the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, as when the Tariff Commission acts and the President promulgates a rate on the findings of that Commission. No rule is laid down in the proposed act. The question has been asked of a proponent of this measure what there is in the proposed act that constitutes a rule, and an answer has been made, the subject of which I now discuss. The words which he pointed out were as follows:

* * * whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time.

The most casual reading of that clause results in the conviction that it establishes nothing more than a condition precedent to the beginning of his functions under the bill. It does not affect or guide the amount of the rate. It does not furnish a measure or yardstick by which to measure the rate.

No formula is provided for that other act of lawmaking, namely, classification, the writing of the phraseology which shall determine, for example, whether a stone imported here from Sweden is manufactured or unmanufactured. We know from experience that for years and years granite was imported into this country as unmanufactured, though there had been performed 40 cents' worth of labor per cubic foot on it, and it had been pointed, pitched, and lined, and was indeed a manufactured product.

The President, under the terms of the bill, whenever he finds this condition as a precedent to beginning the performance of his function, may write a formula by which a customs officer shall ascertain what is a manufactured and what is not a manufactured product. That is making the law. It is not executing the law. There is nothing in the bill which affords a guide or a formula for him to write the phraseology of the classification.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Another danger is as to the facts upon which the President is to base the exercise of the authority now to be granted. To his own satisfaction, without any limitation or guide being laid down, he is the judge as to whether the facts justify the act. What is the limit?

Mr. AUSTIN. I understand that the bill imposes no limit at all, but provides whenever he "finds as a fact." That is all there is.

Mr. FESS. Consequently there is no limit at all to his authority.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is empirical. There is no sky to it. There are no eastern or western bounds. There are no northern or southern bounds. The President may change his mind. He may have a different opinion the next moment after he has fixed the classification or established the rate, and put his new opinion or judgment into effect swiftly. That is the object of the bill, that things may be done swiftly. Speed! Speed! Change! A new deal! That is the object of the bill. All the considerations must go under and be suppressed if only we attain a new deal.

The proposed law would authorize treaties eliminating particular excessive duties or adding to particular inadequate duties, and it might involve negotiating world tariffs among 60 or 70 nations, every one of which would be different in respect to some article, rate, or form of import duty, or classification of articles or limitations, prohibitions, charges, or exactions other than duties imposed on importations, or imposed for the regulation of imports.

I ask Senators to consider the contrast in these forces and in these policies and in these treatments. On the one hand, as I have said, he may make these particular changes. On the other hand, the law also permits the negotiation of treaties affecting the whole of American tariffs and generally lowering or raising them, involving an entirely different policy and a different execution thereof.

In considering these two different and opposing policies we must review the ancient conflict between conditional most-favored-nation treatment, and unconditional most-favored-nation treatment. We must also recognize that whatever treaty may be made cannot be exclusive, but that the duties and restrictions proclaimed must apply to the same articles of all foreign countries without any quid pro quo from the other countries.

A typical most-favored-nation clause containing a quid pro quo is as follows, and I think this is from probably the finest source to which we can go for it, and that is to Prof. W. W. Wallace, who is Chief of the Division of Foreign Commerce in the Tariff Commission. I quote:

> The contracting parties desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth, by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations in respect to commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession was conditional.

That is a typical most-favored-nation clause according to practice and theory in the United States. What does the bill provide?

On the other hand, the bill gives all the most-favored-nation benefits without the quid pro quo, thus:

> * * * The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly, * * *.

The proposed act is equivocal. It requires that the benefits of each separate treaty be extended to all foreign countries without our obtaining from any of them, save the single country which has allowed us compensation, the quid pro quo for our concession to the treaty country.

The authority to enter into the foreign-trade agreement for a quid pro quo with any particular country is granted by subsection (1) of section 350 (a), page 2, line 17:

> To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof;

I am referring now to one particular policy, let it be understood. I am not referring to the policy as to the taxes or the policy of the regulating of commerce or the policy of making treaties without any ratification by the Senate. I am dealing with the determination of that preliminary and first question of whether the Government shall be committed by its President to specific changes with limited effect or whether there shall be treaties reducing generally and as a whole the entire standard or level of tariff duties. That is a great question which affects thousands of articles and items. It comprehends the entire book of international relationship between the United States and foreign countries.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What the Senator has been saying is a tremendous challenge; and if the Senate were in any mood to listen seriously to argument upon this subject, it would yield considerable attention to the point he is making. I desire to see if I understand it.

There is pending a so-called "Colombian trade agreement", which we have not been permitted to see, but which we are told involves certain advantages to Colombia in behalf of coffee in our market. Does the Senator say that, having granted a right in respect to coffee to Colombia in our market, we automatically extend precisely the same grant to Brazil, regardless of any payment by Brazil in return for the benefit thus extended?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do. The language of the bill is clear on that point.

In the first place, the definition of duties and other things which the President is empowered to proclaim is extended by section (c), on page 4 at line 7 of the bill, as follows:

> (c) As used in this section, the term "duties and other import restrictions", includes (1) rate and form of import duties and classification of articles, and (2) limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties, imposed on importation or imposed for the regulation of imports.

That broadens out the definition; and then, when we read the phrase on line 3 of page 3, it is perfectly obvious that the effect of a treaty with Colombia dealing with any one of these factors in international relations extends, without any quid pro quo which we give or receive in the Colombian treaty, to all foreign countries. Thereby we do the strange act that instead of Colombia's being a most-favored nation, as she normally would be considered, she is the most ill-favored nation on earth, because she pays a consideration, whereas all the rest of the world pay nothing to us.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Before yielding further, let me read this phrase of line 3, page 3:

> The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions—

Those are the orthodox words, "proclaimed duties and other import restrictions"; those are the words that are defined as I have pointed out—> shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly.

There we have something that is wholly inconsistent with the most-favored-nation policy of this country, whether under the conditional or unconditional type of treatment, because by the enactment of such a provision and by its operation we create an absolutely clear discrimination against Colombia. It makes no difference what are the terms of the treaty with Colombia; if they favor Colombia more than any other nation on earth has been favored, more than any other nation is favored today, such nation and all other nations are entitled to the same treatment, without paying what Colombia pays to us for the treatment.

I now yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has discovered something that I had not noticed in this bill, but it is very clear to me from the language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana address the chair for the purpose of interrupting the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LONG. I asked the Senator to yield, and he agreed to yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. LONG. In other words, we will say that Cuba has very little oil, but we make a treaty with Cuba allowing oil to come in here at a certain rate, 50 percent less than the normal tariff; and ipso facto that schedule would apply to Colombia, to Venezuela, to Mexico.

Mr. AUSTIN. To every country on earth, if it is a treaty made under this bill.

Mr. LONG. And the only difference would be that while Cuba might be made to pay a little consideration, the rest would come along without having to do any such thing.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is correct.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator from Louisiana has noted the instance of Cuba; and, applying the statement already made by the Senator from Vermont, Cuba would become in that case the most ill-favored nation. Is the Senator perfectly clear that in that instance Cuba would be the most ill-favored nation, or, in the other illustration used earlier in the debate, that Colombia would be the most ill-favored nation? Would it not be true that the United States, having accepted a treaty consideration from one nation only, and then, in return for that, having extended the commercial privileges to all the world, would be the most ill-favored nation?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I accept the amendment. I must admit that when I used the phrase "most ill-favored nation" I was thinking of all foreign nations and not of the United States. If we take into consideration the United States as well as its vis-à-vis in the treaty, as well as all the beneficiaries of this measure, then, of course, the United States is the most ill-favored nation of all, because she trades her markets for nothing to all the rest of the world save Cuba or Colombia, as the treaty nation may be.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I believe some people have decided that suicide is the way out of all trouble. It seems that the United States has decided that suicide is the way out of its troubles. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Under the interpretation of the Senator from Vermont, using the Colombian Treaty as an example, we would then find ourselves in this situation, as I understand:

Colombia is a minor producer of coffee in export to this market. Brazil is a major producer of coffee, sending us something in excess of $100,000,000 worth of coffee a year. Having traded off our coffee market, then, to Colombia, the minor exporter into our market, we would virtually be cut off from hoping to negotiate any subsequent bargain with Brazil in respect to her enormous export of coffee into our market, because already she would have received her benefits under the Colombian Treaty.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is perfectly true, for a limited period. Our hands would be tied behind our backs for 3 years and 6 months at least. We could not change our situation, however urgent the necessity for it might be. I say "necessity" because we have all come to regard hard times as creating a necessity for desperate action here. However desperate the situation might be, we could not change it for at least 3 years and 6 months.

Mr. President, is it not clear that this question of policy is one of the gravest import to this country, and is a question of legislation? It is clear to me that that is true. I assert that the determination of this policy is a legislative question, and that we see it most clearly when we observe the differences between the two treatments and the two policies.

Under the conditional treaty—I am speaking in the past, Senators will understand—we gave favorable treatment, not once and for all and without qualification, but only to such an extent as we deemed a fair equivalent for what was conceded by the other party to the bargain—the other country. Under the unconditional treaty, however, we agreed completely and unqualifiedly to apply to the imports of the contracting country rates as low as are applied to those of any other country whatever.

These two different treatments have at different times prevailed in the United States. The present firmly established principle of tariff policy is uniform and equal treatment of all nations without preferences, concessions, or discriminations, save only as to Cuba.

The proposed act does not adhere to that treatment. It discriminates against the country which pays a consideration for our concession, and, as has been brought out by the Senator from Oregon, it creates a discrimination of greater severity against the United States of America.

To test the question of whether this is legislation or not in which we are handing over power to a coordinate and separate department of the Government which the people prohibited from legislating, I suggest that if the purpose of the proposed act is to make separate agreements for reciprocal reductions of duty, it is an exclusive province of Congress to determine that policy, and Congress cannot delegate it to the President.

If the purpose is to make agreements with all nations for a general raising or lowering of rates reciprocally, it is the province of Congress to determine that policy, and Congress cannot delegate it to the President.

We have most-favored-nation treaties or Executive agreements with 48 nations. We do not intend to abrogate, denounce, and cancel those treaties and agreements.

Nevertheless, if this amendment should be adopted, and the President should make a treaty with Germany, for instance, for the reduction by Germany of her duty on an article from the United States, in consideration for a reduction of duty by the United States on an article from Germany, every other foreign country would enjoy the benefit of the American reduction without paying anything for it. Germany is one of the countries with which we have a most-favored-nation treaty, which is unconditional. Do not Senators see that her status would be reversed by that act of the President of the United States, and she would be enjoying the treatment of the least favored nation on earth as to the article affected, and our treaty obligations would be violated and broken?

To me such a test is absolutely clear in its effect. It seems to me that that test alone is sufficient to show that we are dealing here with a legislative act, the making of the policy, the making of the law itself, and that we are asked to turn over to the President of the United States the power to say whether the United States shall actually denounce this general policy which she has held since 1922, of unconditional most-favored-nation treaties, and their effect and treatment thereunder, denounce them indirectly by implication through the powers given by the proposed act. That can be nothing less than a legislative determination turned over to the President of the United States to be evidenced by proclamation.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. If I fully comprehend what the Senator has brought out as a legitimate conclusion, it is that this delegation of power to the President would enable him to exercise a function which would entirely nullify the existing treatment of nations under the most-favored-nation clause of the tariff law.

Mr. AUSTIN. I claim that that conclusion is irresistible. We have obligations today which are solemn and binding and effective with 48 nations under most-favored-nation treaties. They cannot be denounced by the President alone. It requires a legislative act to denounce them, and certain notice must be given as provided in the treaties.

Mr. FESS. In other words, by act of Congress we are asked to delegate to the President authority not only to undo what has been done under the direction of Congress, but to violate our relationship toward other nations in a discriminatory manner that will create ill feeling.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, there is no other conclusion possible. If the President should exercise the power vested in him by the proposed act, he would have to denounce our most-favored-nation treaties, if he dealt with any one of those nations which are vis-a-vis to us.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is rendering a real service, because that feature of the proposal had not previously come to my attention.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that in the situation, which I have used as an illustration, Germany would pay us for what we forbore to her or granted to her. Is not that clear? Germany would pay us a consideration for it. All the rest of the world would obtain it for nothing, because under the proposed act it would be free to all other foreign countries.

The illustration may be extended and multiplied by as many articles as may be involved in trade and by as many countries as now enjoy the most-favored-nation treatment from the United States.

The vastness of the effect is enough to cause Congress to pause before it turns over that extraordinary power of denouncing and canceling our obligations to the great treaty powers of the earth without any legislative performance in the denunciation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the able Senator from Vermont and the able Senator from Ohio will permit the Chair to make so bold as to ask a question for information, do not the Senators understand that the words "favored nation" and "favored-nation clause" are intended to relate only to individual subjects of the countries in the matter of enjoyment of their liberties and in no wise bear any relation whatever to commerce or trade?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I understand, on the contrary, that in 1922, under the leadership of Mr. Hughes, now Chief Justice, then Secretary of State, we entered upon an entirely new foreign policy. We then adopted a policy which has been continued and is in effect today a firmly established policy of agreeing in all these unconditional most-favored-nation treaties as follows—I read in order not to make an interpretation of my own, but I wish to follow the terms of a typical most-favored-nation-treaty clause:

> The contracting parties, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth, by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations in respect to commerce and navigation which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession was conditional.

I believe, sir, that that proves conclusively that this policy or attitude of the nation relates to the attitude of foreign nations, and comprehends commerce and navigation between two countries, and does not generally refer to the acts of individuals, although I well recall certain engagements with a nation of the Orient which I myself had the honor to negotiate for certain American concerns; and I believe it is claimed by other oriental countries that their nationals are entitled to privileges equally as favorable as those granted to American nationals by those oriental governments. That is a special application of the most-favored-nation or the conditional most-favored-nation treatment. I am dealing, however, with treaties between nations, and not with contracts between individuals and nations. Does that answer the question of the Presiding Officer?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair thanks the Senator for his consideration.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has given the interpretation I had in mind. While all these treaties or trade agreements affect individuals or corporations, the delegation of authority and the agreement carried out under that delegation, of course, are diplomatic actions. The dealings are between government and government. What the Senator is talking about is the authority that will be granted by one government to another in the case of individual transactions; and, therefore, while individual items are dealt with, the real authority is diplomatic.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Ohio for his learned and very clear statement.

Is it not clear that the determination of such a question as is presented by that particular aspect of the bill would be a legislative act? Is it not obvious that what the bill permits is something contrary to the established national policy? I refer to denunciations of treaties. Such a change of policy should not be made by implication, and should not be left to the determination of the Chief Executive in any event. Why? Because when the sovereign people charged the legislature with the duty of performing legislative functions, they prohibited, by virtue of their Federal system of government, the exercise of those powers by any other coordinate and independent department of government.

These observations could well be applied to the second ground of observation; namely, that the policy of the bill is unsound. I use them, however, as bearing upon the first proposition, that the power proposed to be granted to the President is forbidden by the people in the Constitution.

Assuming, however, that we crash through the barrier erected by the people in article I, section 1 of the Constitution, that—

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives—

Do we not then find ourselves on forbidden ground, namely, article I, section 8, clause 1:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, * * *

And article I, section 8, clause 3:

> The Congress shall have power * * * To regulate commerce with foreign nations, * * *.

In dealing with this question I try to express the attitude of the State of Vermont: Whatever authority we have to delegate to the President can rise to no higher degree than the powers expressly delegated by the people acting by States.

When the Federal Congress appears to be exceeding the powers expressly granted to it, when the Congress is considering the passage of a bill that threatens the liberties of the people, then the several States necessarily become the defenders of the Constitution.

The great reservoir of sovereignty rests with the people in the several States.

Vermont was never one of the original colonies. At the declaration of American independence Vermont was an independent State by revolution. For 13 years preceding the American Declaration of Independence, Vermonters conducted a revolution based upon their constitutional rights as Englishmen. They were conscious of the contest between King and Parliament which had prevailed from the Middle Ages to their own day and which had resulted in the Bill of Rights. They were keenly aware that the prerogatives of the King were limited by three constitutional principles so ancient that none could say when they began to exist:

First, the King could not legislate without the consent of Parliament.

Second, he could impose no tax without the consent of Parliament.

Third, he was bound to conduct the executive administration according to the laws of the land.

Vermonters knew these things, and Vermonters had to resort to these things in order to save their homes and their firesides.

Vermonters carved a State out of the royal Province of New Hampshire for the necessity of protecting their contracts, their property, and their business from arbitrary change.

As held by the master in the Boundary case between the State of Vermont and the State of New Hampshire:

> * * * The evidence shows that Vermont was an independent State by revolution. * * *. (Report, p. 99.)

And again:

> Congress recognized that Vermont claimed to be, and exercised the powers of an independent State * * *. (Report, p. 148.)

In the case of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts (9 Law Edition, 1260) the Supreme Court held:

> New Hampshire and New York contended for the territory which is now Vermont until the people of the latter assumed by their own power the possession of a State and settled the controversy by taking to themselves the disputed territory as a rightful sovereign thereof.

All of the sovereignty which had been represented by the Crown and Parliament devolved upon the several States, and not upon the United States, by the revolution.

This principle has been upheld by the Supreme Court many times.

In Pawlet v. Clark et al. (13 U.S. 289) it was held:

By the revolution the State of Vermont succeeded to all the rights of the Crown as to the unappropriated as well as appropriated glebes.

In the Dartmouth College case (4 Wheat. 651) it was held:

By the revolution the duties as well as the powers of governernment devolved on the people of New Hampshire. It is admitted that among the latter was comprehended the transcendent power of Parliament, as well as that of the executive department.

In Mormon Church v. United States (136 U.S. 57) Mr. Chief Justice Marshall quoted the foregoing from the Dartmouth College case.

In McGill v. Brown (Brightly, 346, 373) it was held:

The revolution devolved on the State all the transcendent power of Parliament and the prerogative of the Crown and gave their acts the same force and effect.

Mr. President, it gives me some comfort to record here that Vermonters are faithful to their President. After an election they freely, enthusiastically, and loyally support him, whether he be a Republican or a Democrat.

Notwthstanding their doubts about the new deal, Vermonters have tried to cooperate with the President in his earnest and sincere efforts for relief and recovery. Whenever men in important positions of trust and high office have committed acts that embarrassed the President they have regretted it.

Vermonters still desire to support the President so far as it can be done without violating the Constitution. Constitutional liberty and the free institutions necessary to maintain it cost Vermonters so much, and are regarded as so necessary, that an unconstitutional act proposed to be passed by Congress is opposed by them, notwithstanding their desire to support the President.

In discussing this bill there is no intention on my part to question the relative ability of one President as against that of another to exercise the powers proposed to be granted.

By bitter and costly experience, Vermonters have learned that the Federal system of distinct separation of National and State government, reserving to the State the police power over local affairs, and of a division of Federal authority and responsibility into three independent coordinated departments, is absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty and to keep government free.

I have not the time to go, nor would I try the patience of the Senate by undertaking to go, into that dramatic, that tragic experience of Vermont which led to her independence and to her position as a sovereign State, and to her becoming one of the contracting parties to the great compact known as the Constitution; but I do graphically point out that after 13 years of revolution, Vermonters encountered and overcame the bitter hostility of Congress—a feeble, almost an effete Congress—which endured for 14 years thereafter, and was expressed by an attempt on the part of Congress to exercise police powers in Vermont that nearly culminated in a war between the Green Mountain State and the United States. Remember, Vermont was not then a Colony or a State of the Union; she was an independent republic.

For 14 years longer, after Vermont's declaration of independence, after the Declaration of Independence of the United States, Vermont conducted an independent republic, founded upon a written constitution, backed by her own army. She had contributed to the common cause of liberty during the American Revolution an effective defense of the northern frontier, closing that great gateway into the Colonies by way of the St. Lawrence River and Lake Champlain. She had maintained her military forces without assistance from others, and had contributed food, hardware, and a regiment to the Continental troops.

Notwithstanding all this, her independence was denied by Congress; her right to join the Union was refused; and she was obliged to, and did, coin her own money, establish her own tariffs, conduct international negotiations, maintain her autonomy, and preserve her State sovereignty against great hazards and at much grievous sacrifice.

Do you wonder, Mr. President, after 27 years of fighting for liberty and constitutional government, that Vermonters resist every attack, not occasionally resist attacks, but resist every attack upon the Constitution of the United States and upon the Federal system of government? Vermonters having fought for 27 years to maintain State sovereignty resist every attempt by Federal power to rob the State of her sovereignty, in an irregular manner and without her consent. Vermonters feel that prosperity purchased at the cost of liberty would not be durable and is not desirable.

The proposed bill strikes at the fundamental law created in part by Vermonters when they ratified the Constitution on January 10, 1791.

On the 4th day of March 1791 Vermont was admitted into the Union as a "new and entire member of the United States of America" (Finding, p. 405). Not being carved out of any other States but as an independent republic, in all her dignity, in all power, and, I will add, in all her glory, she came into the Union under the terms of the Constitution, and when any men or any group or organization attack that relationship, Vermont comes to its defense.

She was the first State to come into the Union after the Original Thirteen States and from that time to this she has frequently recurred to fundamental principles, firmly adhered to the Bill of Rights, and as valiantly supported, as she is now supporting, the Constitution of the United States.

The pending bill contains great cause for fear. It concentrates in the Executive the power to make the law governing our relations, commercially, with our international neighbors, and it concentrates in the Executive the power to create duties, imposts, excises, and to promulgate restrictions, to decide treatment, to fix limitations, to set up prohibitions, to write the very phrases which shall define the classification of articles for import duties, to create the form of such duties. In fact, there is not one single characteristic of legislation relating to international commerce that is not centralized by this proposed bill in the Chief Executive.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator is known as quite a constitutional scholar. I read in the remarks of some of my Democratic associates when this question was before the Senate the last time, logic to this effect, if taxing power of this character could, without any rule, be lodged in the Executive, there was no reason why the power could not be lodged in him to levy income taxes. Would the Senator feel, if the pending bill provided a valid grant to the President, that we could not authorize him to levy income taxes?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I cannot follow anybody far enough to recognize that the powers attempted to be granted by this bill are constitutional; and certainly I could not follow the Senator from Louisiana in the suggestion, which I know he does not believe, that we could delegate the power of levying income taxes to the President.

Mr. LONG. I agree with the Senator; I am firmly of the opinion, as he is, that such a grant of power should not seriously be considered to be constitutional, but if this character of legislation is constitutional, which I do not for a moment admit, I see no reason why the President could not be empowered to levy domestic taxes, including income taxes; and if this international treaty power is valid, I can see no reason why we could not add another phrase to this bill authorizing the President to declare war and appropriate money.

I think when we give him the power over international treaties, the power over international agreements, power to make them and power to break them, that we could go one step further and have him be the judge as to when an act of war had been committed and when the national defense should be used for that purpose.

Mr. AUSTIN. The remarks of the Senator from Louisiana bring out in great relief the significance of this dangerous step which we are taking. They bring out the hard way of the transgressor of the Constitution. We know not when we reach the end of that road, if once we start upon it; we may put the power of the purse in the hands of the Chief Executive now, and later put the power of the sword in his hands—and then where are we? We must foresee, if we are rational legislators, the possibilities. We must examine a proposed law, not solely with reference to its probabilities, but it is our duty, as defenders of the Constitution, under our oath and representing our people, the sovereigns who vested in us this duty, to test this bill and every other proposed act with reference to the possibility of abuse of the liberty of the people.

The bill permits the President to enforce a change of his mind, however suddenly made, by terminating treaties upon due notice, thus exposing our industrial workers, our dairymen, and other agriculturists of this country to the uncertainty and instability of one man's opinion.

The attempted delegation of the taxing power and the power to regulate commerce contained in the pending bill would tend to break up the Federal structure, and therefore menace our liberties.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to discuss the subject of the treaty-making power which is contained in this bill.

The feature of the proposed bill which empowers the President "to enter into foreign-trade agreements" without the approval of the Senate is in direct conflict with clause 2, section 2 of Article II of the Constitution, reading:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; * * *

The use of the terminology "trade agreements" does not take the case out of the connotation of treaties.

In Foster v. Neilson (2 Peters, 253) the court held that a treaty is, in its nature, a contract, not a legislative act. It is equivalent to an act of the legislature whenever it operates without the aid of any legislative provision. There is a dictum that applies to this situation exactly. It becomes a legislative act whenever it operates without the aid of the Senate.

In Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U.S. 267) it is held that the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiations between this Government and those of other nations.

It seems clear that foreign-trade agreements which include in their scope the rate, form of import duties, classification of articles, limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties imposed on importations, or imposed for the regulation of imports, constitute treaties.

Let us see how our forefathers, generation after generation, have looked upon such agreements, because practical construction by intelligent men who have dealt with these questions is the very best evidence of what they mean. The practical construction placed upon such agreements throughout our history has been in accordance with that idea.

There is internal evidence in the bill that the subject matter is treaties; namely, the provision extending the effect of the so-called "trade agreements." The measure provides, on page 3, line 3:

> The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries.

Is that a characteristic of a contract or of a trade agreement? Not at all. It is a characteristic of treaties. It is not a characteristic of simple contracts or agreements. The very language of the proposed act fits the orthodox definition of a treaty. Webster gives us one definition:

> An agreement made by negotiation or diplomacy; specifically, an agreement, league, or contract made between two or more states or sovereigns and solemnly ratified.

The practical construction of agreements relating to tariff throughout our history has been that they were treaties. The entire reciprocity record is uniform in such practical construction.

Agreements, though negotiated, which were not effective because they were not ratified, occurred as follows:

1854, with Germany. That was consummated between the contracting parties; and if it could have been in fact a trade agreement and not a treaty, it would have bound the country; but it never became effective. Why not? Because they put upon it the practical construction that it was a treaty, and because it was not ratified it never went into effect.

1883, with Mexico; 1884, with the Dominican Republic, both of which involved the same situation; 1898, the "Argol agreements" with France, Portugal, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, Spain, Bulgaria, United Kingdom, and the Netherlands. There was a great group of obligations which would have been binding upon the United States and her vis-à-vis if they could have been construed as trade agreements and not treaties. But were they? Ah, no! They were completely negotiated between the contracting parties, but they failed because they died in legislation. The Senate of the United States failed to ratify them. No better proof could be had that they were construed as treaties than the fact that they had no effect because they were not ratified.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONERGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Does the Senator have the data showing why they failed?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not in that particular case. I know the story of how these treaties perished in the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate and never came out of that committee, but I do not know the reason why the Senate took no further action on them.

Mr. HATFIELD. Does the Senator take the position that the bill is unconstitutional?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is what I have been spending considerable time discussing, and I have not quite finished.

Mr. HATFIELD. I apologize. I was necessarily absent and did not hear the Senator's entire remarks.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am now making the point that it is unconstitutional because it violates the treaty-making power which is granted to the President only when and if the agreements are consented to and ratified by the Senate. That is the point of my discussion. I am pointing out that the words "trade agreement" are a mere device, that they really mean a treaty, and that they require just as much solemnity to give them effect as if the word "treaty" had been used instead of the words "trade agreement."

I am now pointing out that a great number of reciprocal trade treaties never went into effect for the sole reason that they were not ratified by the United States Senate, or by the parliaments of visa-à-vis countries, thus showing that, in practical construction as to how these reciprocity arrangements were treated, they were treaties requiring ratification and not trade agreements, although the subject matter was exactly and identically the same as the subject matter of the proposed act.

Mr. HATFIELD. As I understand, from a lay point of view, should the bill be enacted into law, as I presume it will be, giving the President the power to negotiate treaties or trade agreements, and should a succeeding Congress decide that it did not want the Chief Executive longer to have that power and the Chief Executive decided that he wished to keep the power, it would take a two-thirds vote of the Senate to pass any measure that had for its purpose the taking away of that authority from the President. Is that true?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not understand that to be the case. I understand that should this bill be passed and should the President act under it and make any of the agreements, and they were held to be or were regarded in practical effect as valid without ratification by the Senate, then our hand would be palsied for at least 3 years and 6 months.

Mr. President, I now point to cases where ratification did occur, thus furnishing the highest type of proof that the practical construction placed upon these relationships is not that they are trade agreements but that they are treaties.

The following tariff-reciprocity agreements were ratified by the Senate:

1854, Great Britain for Canada.

1890, Great Britain for Newfoundland.

1903, Cuba.

This is proof, with no equivocation and no chance to construe it any differently, of their regard as treaties.

A list of many other treaties not specifically providing for reciprocal tariff but, nevertheless, affecting it by virtue of the most-favored-nation treatment clause is given in a table which I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. AUSTIN. These indicate the unvarying practice to ratify them as treaties.

Zy whatever name the relationship that would be created under the pending bill may be called, the character of it, and the effect of it upon the life of our people, is such that it amounts to a treaty relationship. It could upset every rate, every classification, every form of duty, and every tariff treatment comprehended in the Tariff Act of 1930. It could injuriously affect every citizen of the United States.

It is of sufficient gravity in effect to require obedience to the command of the Constitution that it be ratified by the Senate.

In conclusion of the first point:

Our forefathers adopted the Constitution of the United States in part as a reaction against economic chaos caused by the impotency of the Continental Congress under the Articles of Confederation, and because there was no satisfactory distribution of powers therein.

The Continental Congress was a mere debating society, a thing toward which we are trending when we delegate our duty and authority to the Chief Executive. That Congress was a mere convention of ambassadors from the several States, a thing toward which we are certainly headed by the type of legislation we have been passing and are now asked to pass. Out of commercial chaos, repudiation of debt, unsupported paper money, and political disorder threatening dissolution emerged the conventions to amend the Articles of Confederation, which resulted in the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, the greatest single achievement for stable government humanity has ever reached.

With such experience to warn us, and in the light of the most remarkable progress in civic, social, and economic development made under and by virtue of that Constitution, can we knowingly and willfully pass a measure so fraught with menace to American institutions and American liberty?

Our forefathers had the general welfare of the people before them in adopting the Constitution. It, with the Bill of Rights, contains the only protection of the people from their Government. If there were but one copy of it extant, it would be cherished and protected above any other possession of the people.

That great Vermonter, Calvin Coolidge, summoned us to the defense of it in the following eloquent words:

> The Constitution is not self-perpetuating. If it is to survive, it will be because it has public support. Such support is not a passive but an active operation. It means making adequate sacrifice to maintain what is of general benefit.
> The Constitution of the United States is the final refuge of every right that is enjoyed by any American citizen. So long as it is observed, those rights will be secure. Whenever it falls into disrespect or disrepute, the end of orderly organized government, as we have known it for more than 125 years, will be at hand.
> The Constitution represents a government of law. There is only one other form of authority, and that is a government of force. Americans must make their choice between these two. One signifies justice and liberty; the other tyranny and oppression. To live under the American Constitution is the greatest political privilege that was ever accorded to the human race.

Mr. President, in closing the first round of opposition to this measure, as I do, with this eloquent sounding of the trumpets by that great leader of people, I realize that it would make no difference whatever with what authority words such as these were spoken; it would make no difference with what fire they blazed; within these walls they would have no effect. But, thank God, we still live among people who have not lost their character, people who still have courage, who still have a sense of moral obligation, who will hear these words and who will react to these words; and that is why such effort as is made by me here today is made at all within these walls.

2. THE POLICY OF THE PROPOSED ACT IS UNSOUND

I now take the time, even at the discomfort of my colleagues here, to discuss the second reason why I oppose this measure; namely, that the policy of the proposed act is unsound.

The United States has tried out and discarded reciprocity-tariff treaties.

Those treaties were specific as to particular country, and specific as to articles involved on both sides. They were not general. They did not have the effect of a general lowering or raising of American tariffs in exchange or retaliation for a raising or lowering of tariffs elsewhere in the world.

They excited the unfavorable reaction of counterbargaining by other countries against us.

The most notable example of such treaties was the treaty with Canada. We had 11 years' experience with that treaty, beginning with 1855, when the Canadian Parliament ratified it, and ending in 1866.

Vermonters assumed leadership in the abrogation of that treaty, probably because they were at the gateway of the country on the north and most keenly realized the bad effects of the treaty.

In 1864 Representative Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, offered an amendment to a bill which was designed to appoint a commission to negotiate a new treaty. This amendment was for complete abrogation of the treaty. It was defeated by a vote of 82 to 74. In the Senate, Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, and Senator Collamer, of Vermont—to whom I have before referred, and to whom I hope to refer again—led the fight for abrogation on the ground of adverse trade balance and the need for more revenue.

In 1865 the Senate passed the Morrill joint resolution for abrogation by vote of 33 to 8, and President Lincoln gave the required year's notice to abrogate, and thus ended the only significant reciprocity treaty this country ever had.

The grounds for abrogation were the distadvantage to the United States in respect to adverse trade balance and diminution of revenue.

Other illustrations are the treaties in 1891 to 1892 with Brazil, Dominican Republic, Spain for Cuba and Puerto Rico, Salvador, Nicaragua, Honduras, Guatemala, and Austria-Hungary.

These treaties proved to be of disadvantage to the United States and were impossible to execute in view of the Democratic Tariff Act of 1894, which placed a duty on raw sugar.

Sugar, under those treaties, was one of the articles agreed by the United States to be admitted free of duty. Therefore those treaties were in effect abrogated by the Tariff Act of 1894. They lasted only 2 years, and they were formally abrogated in the same year, 1894.

After an experience of approximately 100 years with reciprocity treaties, the only reciprocity treaty which survives today is the treaty with Cuba.

Our experience has taught us to know that the competition between countries commercially is very keen, and that bargains in which mutual concessions are made between specific countries and us are a species of economic alliance. They provoke competing alliances among other groups in self-defense.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will remind the country that while in the abrogation of the treaty in 1894 the leadership in the House and Senate was Republican, the measure was signed by a distinguished Democratic President, Grover Cleveland.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator from Ohio for his remarks; and I desire to say—I intended to say it before—that I think one of the best evidences of the civic virtue of our people is their ability to accept the verdict of the polls, and to get behind their President and to help him so long as he stays within the Constitution. I am reminded that my own people loved Grover Cleveland. They supported him 100 percent; and when he died, the Republican chairman of the State convention which was held the day following the death of Grover Cleveland opened his keynote speech with a eulogy of that great Democrat, and received a perfect ovation from a crowd that filled the great hall to overflowing.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Vermont has made a very significant statement, that the people will accept the verdict at the polls. Has the Senator heard it denied yet that the verdict at the polls was a verdict of approval of the Democratic platform promising not to do the very thing we are now doing here?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I think that is a justified comment. I have often thought that the program we have been following was not the Democratic program.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. May I be pardoned if I interpolate at this moment that the eminent leader of the Republican side, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] [laughter], has on several occasions disclosed his capacity to interpolate such appropriate observations as he has just made. What pleases me is to find the able constitutional lawyer from Vermont and the equally eminent constitutional advocate from Louisiana in complete harmony. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment——

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I helped write a platform for the Senator from Illinois. He had to stay in the Senate and mind our mutual business. I went over to Chicago to help write a platform; and we wrote a platform there declaring that we would not do what is proposed here, but that we would repeal what already had been done along this line. That was so in keeping with the ideas of my friend from Illinois that when I returned here he assisted me in many of my little party contests and in maintaining my dignity as a Senator in this body.

Mr. President, I have not yet heard from the Senator from Illinois; I do not know whether he still is in the Democratic Party or not; but assuming that he is, knowing that he understands the meaning of words, I can assure the Senator that he and I are both going to stand together in initiating the quondam Republicans into the Democratic Party. It is not often that a party is deserted en bloc. Down in the South American countries a whole army will be fighting on one side, and the first thing you know they will take the whole army and put them on the other side of the fence. Manifestly nobody knows just where the Democratic Party in the Senate has gone, but it has deserted the Democratic platform, it has deserted the promises of President Roosevelt, and if there is a Member on the Democratic side of the Chamber who will say that this bill is not a violation of the Democratic platform and of the promises of Roosevelt, I have not yet heard it said. It is a conspiracy of silence. It is the march of suicide. I do not recall the exact wording of that famous suicide verse, but it was somewhat as follows: "Come, Romeo, hold my hand, and I will reach as far as I can."

[Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. LEWIS. It is true I was in the convention, and then had to leave it to return to duties here, but I left it in the hands of such flaming lights as the honorable Senator from Louisiana, whose trail of glory is still to be seen when one reflects upon the Democratic convention.

I answer him, that for myself, he may have no doubt I stay with the Democratic Party, because it is right and righteous. I remain with the Democratic Party because it is attempting to guide itself along the righteous path, and if it shall fall to me to undertake the task of bringing back any deserter, if there be such from the Democratic Party, into the Democratic Party, I would turn to the eminent Senator from Louisiana, with the desire of bringing him back to the faith of his fathers, and would welcome him as a brother under those conditions.

In the meantime, sitting, as he does, upon the side of the honorable opponents, he lends them the benefit of his guiding spirit, and I have no doubt they are much gratified in having a leadership so eminent and potent as that of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont has been very generous, but I should like to have him yield to me just to say one word in defense of the Democratic Party.

Mr. AUSTIN. I gladly yield to the Senator from Louisiana. I hope, however, that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle have decided who has the opening and close of this delightful interlude.

Mr. LONG. As is well known, the Democratic Party in the last campaign stood on the assurance that it was telling the truth that time; in other words, we declared in the campaign document which we wrote in Chicago—and I assume the declaration would have been written in it had my friend remained in Chicago; in fact, I think it probably would have been couched in a little bit stronger language—that the party stood on its record for telling the truth, and that the party said to the people, "We want you to know what we are going to do now. We are going to repeal this power to break a tariff which has been lodged in the hands of the President." That is what the party said in effect, in almost those words.

If they had no idea as to what they were doing, all they had to do was to turn to the votes cast by myself and by the Senator from Mississippi and by the Senator from Illinois, who had voted just a few days before that to annul the flexible provision of the tariff law.

I say to my friend from Illinois, if he is to bring me back into the party, assuming I am out—so far as some things are concerned, I may be out—if we are to bring anyone back into the party, what are we to bring them back to?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am sorry to interrupt the Senator from Louisiana, and though I should like to help the Democratic Party to the full, I must go on with this speech in the interest of arriving at a vote.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. I was undertaking to point out that the history of a hundred years of experience with reciprocity agreements was replete with evidence of such agreements provoking other national groups to make like agreements that were opposed in interest to this country, and, therefore, we should not step out, in the light of such experience, and revert to an ancient policy and an ancient practice which always did us harm, and which we finally repudiated and turned away from entirely in 1922.

I have already pointed out, in discussing the unconstitutionality of the bill, that the policy of the bill is unsound, for the reason that it confuses our commercial relations under the most-favored-nation treatment policy which we have followed since 1922. In 1922, under the leadership of Mr. Justice Hughes, then Secretary of State, we assumed the attitude of unconditional most-favored-nation treatment, which is our present policy.

The confusing effect of a program of tariff bargaining is indicated in two tabulations, and an explanatory statement published in the monthly bulletin of the American Tariff League of May 1934, which I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit B.)

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, these tables show the extent to which concessions granted to principal European countries would be passed on to most-favored nations without any quid pro quo. They are evidence which show the unsoundness of the policy of this measure.

DEFENSE FROM DISCRIMINATION WITHDRAWN

I now come to something else. To me this is the most amazing unsoundness in the bill, and I have not heard it adverted to, perhaps because I have not been able to be in the Senate all the time and to hear all of the discussion. I refer to the subject of the withdrawal of defense from discrimination. Having adopted that great, altruistic policy of unconditional most-favored-nation treatment to all the nations of the earth, we have to have some defense against discrimination by foreign nations.

A serious injury which the proposed bill would do to the well-rounded-out and perfected tariff law of the United States would be the repeal by the proposed bill of all of those provisions in the tariff system in advance of negotiations for substitutes. With these provisions taken out of the 1930 law the United States will be entirely disarmed, and labor and capital of this country will be without any defense whatever from foreign discrimination.

These provisions in the law were put there because from experience we found that they were necessary in view of the special bargaining policies of Spain and France, and the intraimperial preference policy of Great Britain.

Our attitude of equal rates for all and special privileges for none must have some sort of sanction behind it. This was the sanction; that is to say, the power behind the most-favored-nation policy of this Government.

Mr. President, these provisos which I call to the Senate's attention will be expressly, wholly, completely repealed, whenever we pass the pending bill and it becomes a law.

Paragraph 369 (a) of the Tariff Act of 1930 covers automobile trucks, automobile-truck and motor-bus chassis, automobile-truck bodies, motor busses designed for carriage of more than 10 persons, and so forth. It is quite an item. We have this in the law as it exists today as the only defense, with other provisions, against discriminatory practices and treatment by foreign nations:

(d) If any country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government imposes a duty on any article specified in this paragraph, when imported from the United States, in excess of the duty herein provided, there shall be imposed upon such article, when imported either directly or indirectly from such country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government, a duty equal to that imposed by such country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government on such article imported from the United States, but in no case shall such duty exceed 50 percent ad valorem.

Again, the bill proposes to repeal, right now, the proviso to paragraph 371, which relates to bicycles and parts thereof, not including tires, and it provides the same kind of a defense duty.

Then we turn to paragraph 401, and we discover there something that is very important to the people of Vermont:

Timber hewn, sided, or squared, otherwise than by sawing, and round timber used for spars or in building wharves; sawed lumber and timber not specially provided for; all the foregoing if of fir, spruce, pine, hemlock, or larch—

And so forth.

Here is a concession that is repealed:

Provided, That there shall be exempted from such duty boards, planks, and deals of fir, spruce, pine, hemlock, or larch, in the rough or not further manufactured than planed or dressed on one side, when imported from a country contiguous to the continental United States, which country admits free of duty similar lumber imported from the United States.

That proviso would be repealed by the passage of this bill. Now, let us find another. This is a part of a proviso to paragraph 1402:

If any country, dependency—

And so on, charges a duty in excess of the duty therein provided, then a duty corresponding or equal thereto shall be charged by the United States. What does this apply to?

Paper board, wall board, and pulpboard, including cardboard, and leather board or compress leather, not plate finished, supercalendered or friction calendered, laminated by means of an adhesive substance, coated, surface stained or dyed, lined or vatlined, embossed, printed, decorated, or ornamented in any manner, nor cut into shapes for boxes or other articles and not specially provided for—

But that is not all. We are building up here quite a volume of articles, are we not, from which the defense is removed?

The next one is paragraph 1650.

Coal, anthracite, semianthracite, bituminous, semibituminous, culm, slack, and shale, coke; compositions used for fuel in which coal or coal dust is the component material of chief value, whether in briquets or other form.

What do we do to this? We take away the defense provision of the section which provides—

That if any country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government imposes a duty on any article specified in this paragraph, when imported from the United States, an equal duty shall be imposed upon such article coming into the United States from such country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government.

We are going to wipe that out, however.

Then turn over to paragraph 1687, and what have we there?

Gunpowder, sporting powder, and all other explosive substances, not specially provided for, and not wholly or in chief value of cellulose esters.

And the proviso which affords our Government the power to defend itself against discrimination in respect to those articles is to be wiped right out.

Then we turn over to the next one. Here is one which affects the State of Vermont very closely; namely, paragraph 1803.

Wood:

(1) Timber, hewn, sided or squared, otherwise than by sawing, and round timber used for spars or in building wharves; sawed lumber and timber, not further manufactured than planed, and tongued and grooved; all the foregoing not specially provided for.

There the defense provision of the statute is provided expressly to be repealed entirely, completely, without any condition attached to it.

What does that mean? These provisions are for defense by the United States against unfair practices and discriminatory duties by other countries.

The bill takes to pieces the Tariff Act of 1930. The assumption seems to be that the United States would be successful in negotiating treaties containing mutual concessions and bargained rates upon every article to which I have referred, and with every country that exports articles to which I have referred in these sections. This is a large order.

Will Rogers has said:

The United States never lost a war and never won a conference.

One does not have to be as pessimistic as this statement suggests to realize the danger of removing these defense duties from our tariff system in advance of negotiations for substitutes. With these provisions taken out of the 1930 law, the United States will be entirely disarmed and labor and capital of this country will be without any further defense whatever from foreign discrimination.

Like children, we tell our President to go to the world with a negotiation which was difficult enough, assuming that we had these defense duties in our law and had some sanction behind him; but we took it all away. We removed the only real strategic power that he has to use in negotiation.

These provisions in the law were put there because from experience we found that they were necessary in view of the special bargaining policies of Spain and France, and the intraimperial preference policy of Great Britain. Our attitude of equal rates for all and special privileges for none must have some sort of sanction behind it. This was the sanction. There is no other.

Taking to pieces the Tariff Act of 1930 in this manner seems like a child taking his toy to pieces in the belief that he is mending it.

If our tariff bargaining should be conducted in the same manner in which Congress would be acting in this respect, the business of the United States would be ruined by this feature of the bill. Congress would remove in advance the most effective asset that the President might have for trade. If we must give the President the power to make rates, let us not cripple him in advance by repealing these sanctions.

If these defense duties should become unnecessary as a consequence of treaties made, then, and not until then, ought they to be repealed.

Apparently, the President will be forced to make treaties regardless of their effect after we have repealed these defense duties.

Is that not a smart position for us to put the negotiator of this country into? Any man who has had any experience at all in negotiating with foreign nationals and with foreign countries knows that he must have behind him all the power and sanction that he can possibly gain and keep, for they are not children in diplomacy and intrigue and all the devices and arts of arriving at an advantageous result in a conversation across the international table.

The bill is entirely unsound in this regard. That part of it should be struck out if the bill is to be passed.

Mr. President, I now proceed to a discussion of another point which, of course, bears upon my second proposition, that the bill is unsound, and that is that the bill is opposed to protection as a theory of tariff making. The proposed act is opposed to the American plan of protection. It will be noticed that I say "the American plan of protection." I suppose that if I took the political attitude alone, and laid the proper stress upon the political side of this question, I would say "the Republican plan", but I have always found in a lifetime of contest in my profession that the strongest position that can be taken in a contest in any forum is that one which is as near the truth as it can be arrived at, and I think the history of tariff making shows that the protective plan is an American plan. In States that have been Democratic, always protection for the products of such States which need protection is chosen as their pet plan. So I choose to discuss the question of the unsoundness of this measure on the basis that it is in conflict not with the Republican plan or the Democratic plan, but that it is in conflict with the American plan of protection.

The theory of the bill is to admit foreign goods and not to exclude them; it is to increase the quantity of foreign goods admitted and not to diminish the quantities thereof. It is to open our markets, which are the finest and greatest markets of the world, to foreign competition. It is to remove protection from labor; it is to introduce the products of foreign labor. All its immediate objectives are claimed in the bill to be for the purpose of promoting outlets in foreign markets for the products of our own labor, but we must pay, therefore, the price of increased competition. That is frankly admitted in the terms of the bill.

No basis of interchange is established by the bill. It invests the President with the power to legislate the basis in every case. He makes the law; he determines what shall be the basis of the exchange. All this is distinctly in opposition to the American doctrine that duties should be fixed with reference to the difference between the standard of living in the United States and that abroad and the difference in wages and other costs of production. This necessary protective basis is utterly ignored by the bill. The welfare of the American people is exposed to the hazard of tariffs fixed on the European basis or the Asiatic basis. Not a single treaty could ever be made without yielding to that foreign influence.

The well-known difference in our form of government from that of European governments, the historic difference in the attitude of the Government of the United States toward its people from that of rulers and the ruling classes of European governments toward their people, advises us of the unsoundness of the proposed change.

The effect of such an act on the people of Vermont would be so poignant, in view of their accessibility to foreign competition, that I use Vermont for illustration of the practical unsoundness of the measure.

Vermont is an agricultural State in which dairying is the principal activity. Three-fourths of the milk shipped into Boston every morning is produced in the State of Vermont. That great milkshed, the Province of Quebec, is readily accessible to the same market. The tariff is a great rock of protection in whose shadow Vermonters find the only safety they have ever had from competition in this one commodity.

Moreover, Vermont's place in industry is important. The State supplies about 60 percent of the monumental and statuary marble of the country and about 29 percent of the building marble. Vermont is truly the granite center of the world. The employees of this industry are highly paid specialists. Barre, Vt., is said to have the highest average wage scale of any city in the United States. From the Barre quarries alone in 1928 there were shipped 252,232 tons of granite—that is, granite in the rough—and approximately 1,514,000 cubic feet of granite were used in finished memorials.

There are 1,790 manufacturing establishments in Vermont; approximately 32 percent of the people there gain their livelihood from industry.

In the textile industry, the census figures for 1925, which are the latest available, show that in that year $14,327,688 worth of woolen and worsted goods were manufactured, and more than $3,000,000 worth of cotton goods.

A brief address of Gov. Stanley C. Wilson on Vermont's place in industry, broadcast from Station WBZ on November 28, 1931, gives a graphic picture of Vermont's activities. It is these activities that would be directly injured by the enactment of the proposed legislation. I ask, Mr. President, that the address by Governor Wilson may be inserted in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

(The address referred to appears at the conclusion of Mr. AUSTIN's speech.)

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator is thoroughly justified in worrying about what may happen to the industries of his State under this contemplated prospectus. If the pending bill shall be administered by the Executive policy committee of the President, as seems probable, and if the committee shall be dominated by Professor Tugwell, as seems entirely probable, inasmuch as he is a member of the committee and usually dominates anything of which he is a member, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that Mr. Tugwell is the author of the following sentence, testifying before the House committee:

I think he—

believes that no industry is entitled to support by a tariff, and I may say personally that I agree with him.

I submit that to the Senator as a justification for his position.

Mr. AUSTIN. I appreciate having that statement in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator from Vermont will allow me, another Senator on this side in addition to myself would like to know when that statement was made and by whom?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is a quotation from the eminent Dr. Tugwell, testifying before the House Committee, I think, on Agriculture at the present session.

Mr. WALSH. What was the date?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to give the date, but the quotation literally, as found at page 9580 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is as follows:

I think he—

Referring to Mr. Weaver, who had preceded him—

I think he believes that no industry is entitled to support by a tariff, and I may say personally that I agree with him.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The present President of the United States stated most specificially that, instead of there being any reduction in the tariff rates on agricultural commodities, they should be increased. I cannot understand how Mr. Tugwell is now coming here to take the position that he is going to wipe out our agricultural tariffs, when it was the promise of the Democratic Party and Mr. Roosevelt, both of them, that there ought not to be any reduction, and that it would be ridiculous to make a reduction in tariffs on agricultural commodities.

Mr. WALSH. That was before the election, though?

Mr. LONG. Yes; that was before the election.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That was also before he reduced the tariff on sugar.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I feel that my remarks are illuminated by these interpolations, and I am very grateful to the learned Senators who have helped me out in this regard. However, I must hasten on, for I feel bound to finish my remarks tonight, in the interest of making progress toward a vote on this bill.

Important forest products, including the manufacture of organs, toys, screen windows and doors, spools and bobbins, plywood, shooks, clothespins, agricultural implement handles, veneer, furniture, penholders, brush handles, as well as manufacturers of portable ovens, gear shapers, and heavy machinery of many varities, would be exposed to the effect of negotiated tariffs determined in part by their competitors abroad and in part by the Chief Executive, and foreign competitors are not so far away, Mr. President; in 2 hours one can go from one industrial center of the United States to an industrial center of the Dominion of Canada.

A tariff affecting any one of the articles I have mentioned, created by means of negotiation between a representative of the United States and a representative of the Dominion of Canada, must necessarily be affected by the interests of both negotiators.

The principal sufferers would be the workmen employed in these industries.

Vermont has already experienced the injury which can come from tariff tinkering in the reduction of the rate on maple sugar from 8 cents per pound to 6 cents per pound, and on maple sirup from 5½ cents per pound to 4 cents per pound, and in the reduction of the rate on agricultural forks, hoes, rakes, and parts thereof, from 30 percent ad valorem to 15 percent ad valorem, and on bent-wood furniture from 47½ percent ad valorem to 42½ percent ad valorem.

But that is only a straw on the surface of the stream indicating the trend of the current. The great danger, the great menace, is the havoc with confidence which the bill would create.

Assuming that the rates of duty on timber, wood products, butter, milk, cream, hay, maple sugar, talc, marble, granite, slate, wheat, corn, rye, flour, textiles, ovens, gear shapers, and other heavy machinery, should not be lowered, nevertheless, the ghastly fear that in a day protection may be removed from any of them destroys confidence, curtails long-time planning, reduces protection, and increases unemployment.

We know that if this bill should pass, somebody must pay the price of reduced rates of duties.

Who will that be?

Every man in business is potentially that person. Therefore, every man in business is injured by the bill.

It is admitted that one man given the authority contained in this proposed law could make treaties more expeditiously, could change rates more speedily, could legislate forms of import duties, could write the phraseology and classifications of articles, could impose limitations and prohibitions, could promulgate charges and exactions other than duties, much more quickly than can Congress. But this is not a sound reason for enacting the proposed law. By the same token a complete change of our republican form of government to an absolute monarchy should be made, for an absolute monarchy can govern more expeditiously and speedily than a republic.

Our forefathers, thank God, chose a republic. They devised means of preventing haste in the administration of government in the interest of stability and security.

I oppose the bill because it creates instability, destroys confidence, provokes international retaliation; because it is in conflict with our fundamental law, is still another step away from free government, and because it is a futile attempt to purchase prosperity at the cost of liberty.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I make myself the mouthpiece for the great statesman Collamer, with whose remarks I opened my address. I read the closing paragraph of that great tariff speech made by him about 100 years ago, for the prophecy made by him therein came true. I believe that prophecy belongs to the situation of today and will come true in the future. I quote:

The sands of my hourglass are nearly run out, and I must close. I choose not to leave the impression that my hopes of my country's final destiny depend on this bill, though I doubt not, if this policy were adopted and persisted in, it would destroy our prosperity; but, sir, there is an elasticity and recuperative energy in the intelligence, enterprise, and resources of this people by which they will redeem themselves. If this is adopted, this people will, under it, suffer deeply; but when suffering they will seek relief, as they have heretofore done, by again abandoning the policy. And though this people may be again deeply convulsed, and though that convulsion may not be a death struggle, yet in the paroxysms of their agony they will crush the party and authors of their sufferings.

EXHIBIT C

Address of Gov. Stanley C. Wilson, of Vermont, on Vermont's Place in Industry, broadcast from station WBZ, November 28, 1931:

VERMONT'S PLACE IN INDUSTRY

In my monthly talks to you this year about Vermont, I have devoted most of my time to problems and facts concerning agriculture and the recreational business. I do not want you to get the idea, however, that Vermont has no standing as a manufacturing State. In fact, although my State is properly classed as agricultural, our industries take creditable position when compared with those of other States. Just to show that this is true, let me tell you a few facts about our industries.

Vermont leads all States in the production of monumental granite, and has honorable position as to building granite. Excellent granite deposits cover large areas in the State and many of them are utilized. Barre, Vt., is truly called the granite center of the world. The employees in this industry are highly paid specialists. Barre is said to have the highest average wage scale of any city in the United States. From the Barre quarries alone in 1928 there were shipped 252,232 tons of granite and approximately 1,514,000 cubic feet were used in finished memorials.

Vermont leads all States in the production of marble. The State supplies about 60 percent of the monumental and statuary marble of the country and abou 29 percent of the building marble. Vermont marble is noted for its beauty. There are more than a hundred varieties, ranging in color from pure white to jet black. Many of the most beautiful buildings and statues in the country are made from this stone. It is to be noted that the great new Supreme Court Building in Washington is to have Vermont marble exterior.

Of slate, with the exception of one State, Vermont produces more than twice the stone quarried by all the other States in the country. The old-fashioned slates on which we used to do our sums when I was a boy in school have gone out of style, but slate is now used in its natural state or pulverized and manufactured for roofing, tiles, billiard-table tops, mantels, stair treads, and many other uses.

Most of us when we speak of talc think of the talcum powder that is so useful for the toilet of the society belle or the baby, but in fact the great uses are in the manufacture of paper, rubber goods, waterproof paint, gypsum, wall plasters, soaps, etc. In the production of talc Vermont holds second place among the States.

Vermont has great deposits of asbestos and is forging ahead in their development with but few sections in competition.

Other Vermont minerals now being successfully utilized include lime, gypsum, and clay. Vermont has extensive deposits of copper and at one time produced the highest grade copper ore in the world. We also have lead, iron, and arsenic deposits that have been utilized to some extent.

The extent of the use of granite, marble, and other stone and mineral deposits is shown by the 1925 census figures which give the value of these products in the State for that year as $20,062,824.

Even though not considered a manufacturing State, Vermont is well above the national average for percentage of populations actually engaged in manufacturing. According to the latest figures available, Vermont has 1,790 manufacturing establishments large enough to count.

Approximately 32 percent of the people of our State gain their livelihood from industry. The total value of manufactures according to the 1925 census was $138,269,861.

In St. Johnsbury, Vt., is the largest scales factory in the world; while in Rutland is the second largest. In Rutland, also, is located the largest company in the world making maple-sugar utensils, together with the largest concern manufacturing granite and marble-working machinery.

In Winooski is situated the largest screen factory in the world; while Burlington leads the world in the production of portable ovens, brush fiber, package dyes, and butter color. A plant at Weathersfield leads the world in the variety of its soapstone products. In Brattleboro is the largest pipe-organ factory in the United States. In Orleans is located 1 or 2 plants under the same management which manufacture the greater part of the sounding boards used in this country. In Bellows Falls is the second largest waxed-paper mill in the country.

Springfield, Vt., manufactures the bulk of the world's last lathes and turret lathes, leads in automatic gear-shaper machines, and has the largest shoddy mill in the world.

At Barnet is a factory which manufactures croquet sets and which supplies to a large extent the entire demands of the trade.

The State may well be considered the headquarters of the spring-clip clothespin industry, millions of clothespins being produced.

Throughout the State are located numerous factories having a wide range of products—all the way from the great automatic-machine tools and the mammoth machines used in the manufacture of granite and marble, down through the numerous wood-working factories producing furniture, baseball bats, box covers, wooden heels, and hundreds of other articles. The finest bowling pins and, I think, the greatest number produced in any State, are made in Vermont. A great many of our Vermont industries are built up for the use of the fine hardwood lumber which is seldom, if ever, found better than in this State. Many wood-working plants are located close to the Green Mountains, where an extensive supply of fine hard wood is now available.

While we do not ordinarily think of Vermont as a State greatly concerned with the textile industry, the census figures for 1925, which are the latest available, show that in that year $14,327,688 worth of woolen and worsted goods were manufactured in the State, and $3,195,418 worth of cotton goods, or, in other words, the textile industry was a close second to the marble and granite industries.

It may seem at first thought surprising that Vermont, situated away from tidewater, is able to make creditable showing in industry, and to lead the world in some industries. The answer comes partly from the fact that one of Vermont's chief industrial assets is her water power. She is one of the two States in the country in which water generates more power than steam.

According to the 1919 census, the primary horsepower developed was 185,095. While I have not the up-to-date figures, this total must be greatly exceeded at the present time, as several great hydroelectric developments have been completed since then in the State. One of these, at Whitingham, is one of the largest in the world, with an earthen storage dam, the dam at the time of its construction exceeding in size any other such dam in the world.

Several great hydroelectric developments are located on the Connecticut River, the largest of which, at Fifteen Miles Falls, is the greatest hydroelectric development in this country east of Niagara.

All over the State are found great natural water powers, of which most of the larger have been utilized for the development of electric energy.

It is easy to see the advantage that inures to Vermont manufacturing establishments from the great supply of cheap power produced almost at the door of the manufacturing plant.

Vermont has good shipping facilities. She has outlets for freight in all directions over trunk-line railroads or their immediate connections, and by water across Lake Champlain to the New York Barge Canal and the Hudson River.

There is another basic fact relating to Vermont which explains further why Vermont industries flourish. Vermont has no large cities. The cost of living is materially less than in the more populous sections of the country.

There is a spirit of loyalty born of long and continuous service surrounding many of the manufacturing plants of the State. The typical Vermont laborer in a typical Vermont industrial establishment takes a personal interest in his work, and the welfare of his employer means much to him.

Labor troubles seldom develop in Vermont. As a rule, there is a mutual regard by the employer and the employee each for the rights and the interests of the other.

To a surprising extent in our State, factory employees own their homes, with the result that the employees as well as the employers have a direct financial interest in the community and in the success and permanence of the business in which they are employed.

Moreover, most of the industries of the State are home owned, and the evils and dangers of distant corporate control are nonexistent. The tendency has been for some time in this country to build up great corporations to control industries, and as a result the personal element has been driven out by the cold-blooded rule of distant management. Vermont is fortunate that even in her largest industries the capital is largely provided by Vermont people, and so the business control is kept within the State, close to the towns where the business actually operates.

There is a tendency in the manufacturing world at the present time to get away from the idea of the great specialized manufacturing centers. The experience of some of the corporations that have tried to combine their plants has not been wholly satisfactory. Business men are now turning to the small-town idea of manufacturing operations. The experience of the past few decades seems to have established that with the exception of a few industries, the advantages of plant location in comparatively small cities or towns outweigh those of location in large industrial centers. This is true because of the lower cost of living, the smaller turn-over of labor, the greater loyalty and efficiency of the employees, and comparative freedom from the burden of high real-estate values.

It has been rather remarkable during this period of depression that the industries of Vermont have to a large extent continued in fairly active operation. They have stood the business depression better than have the industries of other States in the Union.

In these days when we are trying to reestablish industry under changed conditions and on a better basis, Vermont holds out splendid opportunities for the location of manufacturing establishments under conditions that ought to insure successful operation.

I believe no State in the Union presents a better field for operation of industrial plants under the decentralized plan. Certainly in no State can industry be assured of better governmental and community cooperation in proper growth and development. You may be assured of fair treatment to both capital and labor.

If you are interested in locating a manufacturing plant, or a business, in Vermont, or want any facts or detailed information with regard to conditions and opportunities for such location, write to the Vermont Publicity Department at Montpelier for information.

Additional industries to supplement our fine agriculture will receive a hearty welcome in the villages and small cities among the foothills and in the valleys of the Green Mountain State. Vermont invites you.

During the delivery of Mr. AUSTIN'S speech,

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator from Vermont object if I put into the RECORD immediately following his speech the list of items that are affected by either of these provisos that are repealed, with the amounts of the articles?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I shall be glad to have it done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROMOTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN THE NAVY—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. WALSH submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant, to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, and 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

On page 3, line 10, of the engrossed bill, strike out the following word "hereafter" and insert in lieu thereof the following words "in 1934 and hereafter."

On page 3, line 13, of the engrossed bill, before the word "may", insert the following: "and whether they have since been married or not."

On page 4, line 3, of the engrossed bill, after the word "who", insert the following: "in 1934 and."

And the Senate agree to the same.

DAVID I. WALSH,
FREDERICK HALE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
CARL VINSON,
P. H. DREWRY,
FRED A. BRITTEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the conference report settles the differences between the House and the Senate on the bill that was passed last Saturday, being the so-called "naval personnel bill." There was only one important difference between the Senate and the House, and that was on the question of retirement. The House bill provided for the retirement of about 600 naval officers in order to remove the hump in certain grades and which was resulting in preventing the promotion of young and efficient officers to higher grades. The bill also provided for the commissioning of all the graduates from the Naval Academy for 1933, 1934, and in the future. If the bill remained as the Senate enacted it, it would result in an increased expenditure to the Government of about $12,000,000. The Budget and the administration are not willing that the increased expense should be incurred. By providing for the retirement of these officers, who are eliminated after selective examinations, and by the granting of commissions to the graduates at the Naval Academy, there will be a net saving of approximately $12,000,000 to the Government.

The Senate has withdrawn its objection to the provision in its bill in opposition to retirement at this time. Thus, if the conference report shall be accepted, there will be a net saving from the bill as passed by the House and from the bill as passed by the Senate of $12,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H.R. 6803. An act to regulate the distribution, promotion, retirement, and discharge of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 9068. An act to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes.

RECIPROCAL-TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I begin by expressing my appreciation to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], for his very learned and lucid exposition of the pending bill. With his impressive argument that the bill transgresses the Constitution I am fully in accord. With his belief that the bill is so framed that it will operate definitely to the disadvantage of the people of the Nation I am also in accord.

I realize how futile it is, in these days of congressional subserviency to the White House, to obtain consideration for arguments earnestly and thoughtfully made in opposition to a legislative proposal of this kind. In the hope, however, that some faint echo of the words pronounced here may go beyond the walls of this Chamber and find lodgment in the minds of the people of the country, I feel it worth while to present my views upon the pending bill.

All Senators remember that following the enactment of the Tariff Act of 1930 a great hue and cry was raised for partisan purposes. The bill was denounced as infamous. Its critics were not content to call it the Smoot-Hawley Act, but in order to subject it to ridicule and criticism they dubbed it the Smoot-Hawley-Grundy Act. They said it was destructive of the business of the country.

Mr. President, the pending bill does not change any particular duty of the Smoot-Hawley Act. With some little exception, it makes no repeal or modification of that act. It is a bill to create a new part III, to be entitled "Protection of Foreign Commerce", and to add this part III to the Smoot-Hawley Act so that it will supplement that legislation. It is significant that the greatly controverted section 336 which conferred upon the President certain flexible powers is not repealed nor is it modified by this measure except in the provision found on page 4 to the effect that the provisions of section 336 shall not apply to any article concerning the importation of which a foreign trade agreement has been concluded.

In other words, Mr. President, if, pursuant to this measure, a foreign-trade agreement has been concluded, there will then be no further flexible power under section 336 which the President can exercise with respect to the duties specified by that agreement. Until such foreign trade agreement has been concluded, all the powers of section 336 which were so widely denounced by the partisan critics still abide with the President.

The conception, therefore, that this bill is a substitute for something in the Smoot-Hawley Act is substantially incorrect. The bill in terms and in effect is supplemental to the Smoot-Hawley Act, reserving in the President all the broad powers heretofore conferred upon him and granting him new powers heretofore unknown in our scheme of government.

The bill provides that for the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States, and for certain other purposes, the President shall enjoy this new and unusual authority.

The authority is conditioned first upon his findings as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or of foreign countries are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States. In the bill there is no definition of what is required in order to burden and restrict foreign trade; much less is there a definition of what constitutes the undue burdening or the undue restriction of the foreign trade of the United States.

So it has been well said, as it was stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], that so far as this condition is concerned, it is a matter wholly of discretion or opinion in the President. There is no rule to restrain him; there is no rule to prompt him to go forward, except that he states his opinion that certain undue burdens or restraints operate upon our foreign trade.

I do not want to press this point at length. It could be elaborated, I know; but it is not the point that excites my greatest interest. It is not the feature of the bill upon which my more serious apprehensions are founded. I therefore desire to pass to the next phase of the bill, which to me seems to be of vastly greater importance.

When the President finds the facts that these vague and undefined undue burdens and restrictions operate against the foreign trade of this Nation, he may then do two separate acts. First, he may enter into a foreign trade agreement with a foreign government or with some instrumentality of that government. I pause long enough to say that the lack of definition which exists with respect to this condition precedent, to which I made reference a moment ago, exists with even greater force with respect to the first power delegated by the bill to the President.

There is no limitation upon the President in entering into the foreign-trade agreement save an indeterminate and unsatisfactory percentage limitation, to which I shall refer later. There is no control upon the President as to the exact subject-matter of the agreement. The only requirement is that it be a foreign trade agreement and that it be made with a foreign government or with an instrumentality of a foreign government.

The second power delegated to the President, to my mind, is still more alarming than the first. It is here provided as a second power that the President shall be authorized—

To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder.

With respect to this matter, the authority of the President to proclaim modifications is not defined. It is not controlled by legislative formula. It is only vaguely related to any matter of policy, foreign or domestic. It is a carte blanche power in the President, in the case in which he has found, in his opinion, that our foreign trade has been unduly burdened or restricted, and where he has been able to make a foreign-trade agreement with some foreign nation to make such modifications as he may desire or as may be recommended to him by his advisers, whether they be protectionists, free-traders, Americans, foreigners, theorists, "brain trusters", or others.

I am fully mindful that there is a provision that no proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and the free list; but it has been pointed out earlier in the debate that the President retains his power under the present flexible provision of the tariff.

If he desires to reduce duties more than 50 percent, it is only required that he shall first obtain the acquiescence of the Tariff Commission. Its record, in my opinion, has been marred by the testimony of its chairman before the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee in behalf of this bill. The necessary acquiescence, according to the chairman, will be readily given. The President can accomplish a 50-percent reduction under section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930, and then he can enter into a trade agreement, and he can again make a reduction of 50 percent. The total reduction then would be 75 percent.

This statement does not take into account the fact that the President may change the classification or that he may change the form of the tariff, nor does it take into account that the limitation of 50 percent applies only to duties, and not to excise taxes upon imported articles.

I turn aside for the moment to develop that proposition, because I believe it was not referred to by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, and I am most anxious that the RECORD show just what the bill means with respect to the excise taxes of 1932.

It will be remembered that after the enactment of the tariff bill of 1930, Congress saw fit to provide excise taxes upon certain great natural-resource products, and they included in the bill of 1932 certain excise duties upon imported articles of copper, lumber, coal, and oil. Subsequently certain fish and whale oils were added to the category, and there are now five different commodities covered by excise taxes upon importations.

On page 2 of the pending bill, in subsection 2, to which I have already made reference, we find the second power of the President broad enough to cover modifications of "existing duties and other import restrictions." That phrase is most important, because in a subsequent part of the bill, namely, in subsection (c) the phrase is defined, and we find there these words:

As used in this section, the term "duties and other import restrictions" includes (1) rate and form of import duties and classification of articles, and (2) limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties, imposed on importation or imposed for the regulation of imports.

The point I seek to make is that this phrase, "duties and other import restrictions", includes, by express definition, a requirement that limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties shall be regarded as "duties and other import restrictions."

Therefore, the President, under the second power, may reduce, under the phrase "duties and other import restrictions", charges, and exactions, other than duties, if they are imposed on importations.

I have heard no answer to this argument, I have heard no one controvert the contention that under this definition the excise taxes of 1932 are brought within the scope and purview of the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In the original days of the debate the Senator from Mississippi, in charge of the bill, specifically stated that the excise taxes, to which the Senator from Vermont adverts, were excluded from the terms of the bill. Therefore there is a difference of opinion on the subject, and I am very hopeful that before the consideration of the bill shall be concluded the Senator will test the good faith of the Senator from Mississippi, in charge of the bill, by permitting him to accept an amendment which will specifically exempt these elements from the bill.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I do not question the good faith of the Senator from Mississippi, and I regret that the Senator from Michigan suggests that I present this matter in terms of testing his good faith. I realize that there is a difference of opinion, as has just been pointed out by the Senator from Michigan.

I read in the RECORD the statement of the Senator from Mississippi that the excise taxes of 1932 are not intended to be included. I realize that that is his position, but I also realize that the literal language of the bill embraces these excise taxes, and I have heard no answer to the argument I am making with respect to the interpretation of the language, and no suggestion that I am in error in my contention, and no reason which would justify me in the conclusion that the excise taxes under the act of 1932 are not in fact included in the pending bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should not want my reference to good faith be misunderstood. What I undertook to indicate was that I have such complete confidence in the good faith of the Senator from Mississippi that I am perfectly sure that when he realizes that there is a definite challenge to his belief that these excise taxes are not excluded, he will be very glad to accept an amendment which does exclude them textually.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that I made the statement, in opening the debate on this question, that, so far as the excise taxes were concerned, we intended to exclude them. That was the intention of the proposal. Some of the taxes will expire at a certain time. So far as they are concerned, it was not the intention to modify them at all. The modification is in the rates, as previously stated in the proposal.

Whatever amendment is needed to remove any doubt from anyone's mind I shall offer. I have prepared an amendment that will remove even any doubt on that matter.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, that is welcome news to me, and I am very happy to accept the assurance of the Senator from Mississippi, the Chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRISON. That was the intention, and all I care to do is to carry out the intention. May I say to the Senator, further, that when the Democratic conference was held on this matter, I stated, in a discussion in the conference, that that was what the bill contained. For that reason I expect to offer a clarifying amendment on that particular phase of the matter, so as to remove all doubt. However, I do not think there is any doubt now.

Mr. STEIWER. The assurance is doubly welcome, because, in the first place, I think that under the literal language of the bill such an amendment is necessary in order to prevent those items from being caught in the dragnet of the bill, and for the further reason, which has been very alarming to me, that apparently the 50-percent limitation on reductions applies only to duties, and not to the exactions other than duties, so that if these items, which are embraced in the Revenue Act of 1932, were left in the bill, they not only would be subject to the power of the President to make modifications, but, in my own judgment, they might be completely wiped out if the President desired to take such action in connection with a foreign-trade agreement. I am very grateful to the Senator from Mississippi.

I might add that I also have prepared an amendment to exclude the excise taxes, which I sent to the desk today informally, so that it might be printed and lie on the table; but I shall very happily accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi in lieu of my own, if it effects the removal from this bill of that important category of items included in the Revenue Act of 1932.

Mr. President, I wish now to generalize with respect to the real purpose and the final net effect of this legislation.

I have said that the pending bill does not repeal the Tariff Act of 1930, that it does not repeal the flexible provision of that act, that it modifies it only in case a foreign-trade agreement has been made with respect to a particular commodity.

What, then, is to be accomplished by the bill? Obviously the purpose of the bill is to give to the President, without any substantial limitation on his power, or any substantial control, authority to negotiate trade treaties, to enter into those treaties whenever, in his opinion, our foreign trade is unduly burdened, and then, having entered into a treaty, to proclaim modification of duties.

I have wondered, as I have considered the bill, upon what theory the Congress expects the President to modify the duties. Is it to be done upon a theory of free trade, or upon a theory of protective tariffs? Is it to be done upon the understanding that the President will seek to ascertain the differences between the cost of production abroad and at home, and that he will thus seek to equalize an existing duty? Or is it to be done upon the theory that the President shall place first emphasis upon the expansion of the foreign trade and treat the making of duties chiefly as an exercise of power under the commerce clause of the Constitution? Or is it to be done wholly in the discretion or at the whim and caprice of the President?

I shall not discuss in detail the constitutional objections to the bill, save to affirm my belief that upon many grounds the enactment will be an invalid and unconstitutional delegation of power to the President. That argument has been made heretofore by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]; it was made today by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], and by others. I shall not reiterate it. But when the court shall be confronted with the necessity of passing upon the validity of this legislation, the one thing uppermost in the mind of the court will be the fact that after the condition precedent has been complied with, after the treaty is made, when the time comes for the President to modify the duty, there is no formula or rule of action written into this measure, and that the President will make the modification within his own judgment or discretion to meet whatever ideas he may privately entertain with respect to the expansion of foreign trade.

It is that total lack of legislative formula, that complete delegation of discretion to the President to make the law of the land, and to determine what the course of the United States shall be, that makes this bill so clearly and so wholly unconstitutional.

Why is it proposed that we adopt this vague and nebulous treatment of tariff matters? What is there in the existing situation that requires us to take such action. What are the arguments offered? What are the excuses?

It would seem that before we depart from the American policy of maintaining in this country a higher standard of wages and a higher standard of living than the rest of the world has ever known, before we tear down the wall of protection to which both political parties have subscribed in part, if not in entirety, there ought to be satisfactory reasons presented here by the sponsors of this legislation.

The Democratic Party has never been committed to this kind of boundless and unlimited discretion on the part of the President in the treatment of our foreign commerce and the making of our tariff rates. That party has had a policy. It has vacillated somewhat, it is true. We know what that policy has been. We know that the great Democratic Party at one time stood for free trade, and that later it maintained a policy of tariff for revenue only. We know that as the years went by the Democratic Party stood for what it called a competitive tariff. That was a protective tariff, designed to be a little less in amount than the Republican conception of a protective tariff, but a protective tariff nevertheless.

Now we are confronted with the fact, which I think no one can deny, that by the terms of this bill we delegate to the President power to make the policy, to say whether we shall have tariff for revenue only, or whether we shall have free trade; substantially, the power to say whether we shall maintain the present protective system or provide some other.

Why are we called upon to depart from the established policy of this country in order to delegate to the President these boundless and limitless powers?

Let me refer briefly to the attitude of the Democratic Party. Time and the lateness of the hour forbid the kind of presentation I should like to make; but I have here excerpts from numerous platform statements of the Democratic Party. They illustrate something of its policy, and of the tendency or drift which the party has undergone in dealing with the subject of tariff.

In 1872 the Democratic platform included, among other statements, these words:

> We demand a system of Federal taxation which shall not unnecessarily interfere with the industry of the people, and which shall provide the means necessary to pay the expenses of the Government, economically administered, the pensions, the interest on the public debt, and a moderate reduction annually of the principal thereof; and recognizing that there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade, we remit the discussion of the subject to the people in their congressional districts, and to the decision of the Congress thereon, wholly free from Executive interference or dictation.

Mr. President, if I were attempting to make a speech political in nature, and to criticize the great party with which I am not identified, I might point out that in this particular declaration the Democratic Party did not take a definite stand. They avoided the question by remitting the question to the people of the districts, and saying that they would leave it to the Congress, when it met, to take action in accordance with the views of the people, without dictation or interference from the Executive.

In 1884 the platform was more explicit. Let me read one short sentence from it:

> The necessary reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

I suggest, in connection with this language, that the Democratic Party was already committing itself in a qualified way to the theory of protection. It is true that it was known in the country as a free-trade party, but this platform, solemnly declared and published to the people, is inconsistent with that theory.

In 1888 the platform contained this language:

> On the contrary, a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor, must promote and encourage every branch of such industries and enterprises by giving them assurance of an extended market and steady and continuous operations.

The Democratic Party was still leaning toward protection, but, up until that time, I think, had not dealt with the question of reciprocity.

In 1892 the party faced that question for the first time, and in the platform of that year we find this language:

Trade interchange on the basis of reciprocal advantages to the countries participating is a time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith, but we denounce the sham reciprocity which juggles with the people's desire for enlarged foreign markets and freer exchanges, by pretending to establish closer trade relations for a country whose articles of export are almost exclusively agricultural products, with other countries that are also agricultural.

So, Mr. President, in the first expression of the Democratic Party upon the subject of reciprocity we find them far from cordial to the idea. We find, instead, an expression of criticism and condemnation. They obviously thought, as many of us think now, that no trade agreement could be made with nations which have for sale agricultural products of the same character as ours without doing disadvantage to our own people, and they criticised that kind of a trade as a sham.

In 1896 the Democratic platform contained this sentence:

We hold that tariff duties should be levied for purposes of revenue, such duties to be so adjusted as to operate equally throughout the country, and not discriminate between class or section, and that taxation should be limited by the needs of the Government, honestly and economically administered.

This declaration is nearer to tariff for revenue only than any one that I have found in the history of the party in the years immediately preceding 1896.

In 1904 it is interesting to note that the platform contained this sentence:

We denounce protection as a robbery of the many to enrich the few, and we favor a tariff limited to the needs of the Government, economically administered, and so levied as not to discriminate against any industry, class, or section, to the end that the burdens of taxation shall be distributed as equally as possible.

After the swing went in this direction it was not very long until there was a significant change in Democratic sentiment; and in 1908 there is noted a swing back toward protection again.

In 1912 we find this language:

The high Republican tariff is the principal cause of the unequal distribution of wealth. It is a system of taxation which makes the rich richer and the poor poorer. Under its operations the American farmer and laboring man are the chief sufferers. It raises the cost of the necessaries of life to them but does not protect their product or wages. The farmer sells largely in free markets and buys almost entirely in the protected markets. In the most highly protected industries, such as cotton and wool, steel and iron, the wages of the laborers are the lowest paid in any of our industries. We denounce the Republican pretense on that subject and assert that American wages are established by competitive conditions and not by the tariff.

Mr. President, that is the last expression which to any degree touches free trade. In 1924 we find the straightforward declaration as follows:

We declare our party's position to be in favor of a tax on commodities entering the customhouses that will promote effective competition, protect against monopoly, and at the same time produce a fair revenue to support the Government.

Then in 1928 the declaration was still more pronounced. In the platform adopted at the time the Governor of New York, Mr. Smith, was nominated as the Democratic standard bearer we find, among other declarations, the following:

The Democratic tariff legislation will be based on the following policy:

(a) The maintenance of legitimate business and a high standard of wages for American labor.

(b) Increasing the purchasing power of wages and income by the reduction of those monopolistic and extortionate tariff rates bestowed in payment of political debts.

(c) Abolition of logrolling and restoration of the Wilson conception of a fact-finding tariff commission, quasi-judicial and free from the Executive domination which has destroyed the usefulness of the present Commission.

(d) Duties that will permit effective competition, insure against monopoly, and at the same time produce a fair revenue for the support of Government. Actual difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, with adequate safeguard for the wage of American labor, must be the extreme measure of every tariff rate.

There, in the last sentence quoted, is the declaration for protection almost identical in language with a number of Republican platforms. There is adherence to the proposition that there should be a duty equal to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

If there be any doubt about the real purpose of those who controlled the destinies of the Democratic Party in 1928, let me invite attention to one incident which happened during the campaign. Governor Smith delivered an address at Louisville, Ky. In that address, among other things, he said:

In other words, I say to the American workingman that the Democratic Party will not do a single thing that will take from his weekly pay envelop a 5-cent piece; to the American farmer, I say that the Democratic Party will do everything in its power to put back in his pockets all that belongs there; and we further say that nothing shall be done that will embarrass or interfere in any way with the legitimate progress of business, big or small.

Subsequently the nominee made a further statement in an address delivered in Philadelphia. At that time he made some reference to his speech at Louisville, and stated that he had sent wires to the Democrats in the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives in order to ascertain from them whether they would support him in the declaration which he had made at Louisville for the protection of American labor and American industry. In this subsequent speech he described the answers as follows:

"We stand solidly beside and behind Governor Smith in his Louisville speech when he says: 'I definitely pledge that the only change I will consider in the tariff will be specific revisions in specific schedules, each considered on its own merits, on the basis of investigation by an impartial Tariff Commission and a careful hearing before Congress of all concerned; that no revision of any specific schedule will have the approval of the Democratic Party which in any way interferes with the American standard of living and the American standard of wages. In other words, I say to the American workingman that the Democratic Party will not do a single thing that will take from his weekly pay envelop a 5-cent piece; to the American farmer I say that the Democratic Party will do everything in its power to put back in his pockets all that belongs there; and we further say that nothing will be done that will embarrass or interfere in any way with the legitimate progress of business, big or small. With this prescription honestly put forth, with a clear-cut and definite promise to make it effective, I say with confidence that neither labor nor industry nor agriculture nor business has anything to fear from Democratic success at the polls in November, and we hereby pledge our cooperation in carrying out the principles and policies therein set forth.'"

Now, just let that definitely and finally put to sleep all the fears that Governor Hughes or any other Republican spokesmen may have about the Democratic attitude to the tariff; and there is no reason why they should themselves, by their utterances, disturb business by predicting calamity in the event of Democratic victory.

I have here the names of certain gentlemen which were published in the newspapers at that time as having answered affirmatively the wire sent to them by Governor Smith. They were the ones who assured him they would support him in his declaration which he made in his Louisville address.

Among other distinguished names appearing in the published list are the following: Henry F. Ashurst, Alben W. Barkley, Edward S. Broussard, T. H. Caraway, Royal S. Copeland, C. C. Dill, Duncan U. Fletcher, Walter F. George, Carl Hayden, Pat Harrison, Harry B. Hawes, William J. Harris, William H. King, Lee S. Overman, Key Pittman, Joseph E. Ransdell, Joseph T. Robinson, H. D. Stephens, Morris Sheppard, Millard E. Tydings, T. J. Walsh, Burton K. Wheeler, David I. Walsh, Robert F. Wagner.

I submit that when a political party makes a declaration such as was made in the Democratic platform of 1928, and when its standard bearer makes the statement which Governor Smith made at Louisville in the campaign, and when the most distinguished Members on the Democratic side of the aisle in the Senate of the United States permit themselves to be quoted as supporting the nominee in the declaration which he had made, then by every rule of reason such declarations constitute the policy of that party. In that campaign and in the campaign of 1932 there is abundant evidence that the Democratic Party is no longer a party of free trade, but that to some degree it is a party of protection.

The Democratic Party, moreover, have stood against flexibility. They have insisted that duties in tariff laws ought to be made by the Congress, and they have declared themselves upon that issue time and time again.

Now, I ask, Upon what theory do they justify the abandonment of that policy? How do they excuse taking out of the Congress the power to levy the tariff duties? Upon what argument are they to delegate those great powers to the President of the United States? Upon what basis is the Democratic Party to say, "We have abandoned the theory of protection, even the partial theory that we espoused. We abandon even a tariff for revenue. We abandon every established theory, every conception, and we turn all tariff power over to the President. We leave its administration entirely to his discretion and for his determination."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I always listen to the Senator to learn. Upon what does he base the statement that the policy contained in this bill involves a complete abandonment of the various declarations which he has just read?

Mr. STEIWER. I have already developed this point at some length and do not desire to reiterate it in further detail, but, in a sentence or two, let me say that inasmuch as this bill writes no formula for the President, places no boundaries upon him, creates no limitation save an indeterminate percentage limitation, it leaves to the President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is a limitation.

Mr. STEIWER. It may be a limitation. It may not be a limitation. As to the excise items in the act of 1932, I think it is now admitted that it is not a limitation. As to certain other items, it is a limitation of 50 percent after the flexible provision of 50 percent has first been applied, and after the change in form and the change of classification shall have been made. It is a little difficult for those of us who are not tariff experts to define just what that tariff limitation is; but if it is a limitation, it is a limitation in amount. It is a mathematical limitation only; and there is no formula with respect to policy, with respect to the kind of a tariff duty, nor with respect to the purpose of the tariff duty. There is no restraint upon the President upon those important scores; and it is for that reason that I say that this bill takes away from the Congress and delegates to the President the authority to make the determination, and now I submit that he has already made it in advance.

I shall develop later what I mean by that. He has made it in advance, and he has made it in a way that is inconsistent with the quoted declarations of the Democratic Party. By his message to this body he says, in effect, that he proposes to depart from the traditional stand and the established policy not only of the Democratic Party, but of the American Nation, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him by this bill; and I ask again, What is there in the situation to justify a complete reversal and a complete abandonment? What has been assigned here?

It has been said by the sponsors of this bill in effect that the United States has helped bring on the chaos, and business collapse, under which the whole world is suffering; that we have done it by trade restrictions, and that we must confer upon the President a bargaining power so that he may relieve this Nation, and other nations, of these trade restrictions. I quote from one sentence which summarizes the argument. It is found on page 8987 of the RECORD. It is as follows:

> The United States has been one of the most serious offenders in this commercial warfare.

That, Mr. President, is offered as an argument in justification for this legislation. Let us examine the statement, and let us examine the record to see whether or not there is any validity in the argument, or any truth in the statement. I deal with it only as an abstraction. I want it understood that I am not criticizing those who make the statement or who offer the argument; but, as an abstraction, I contend against it because I think it is untrue. I think, moreover, it is unfortunate; that it will be used against our country in foreign councils by those who would very dearly love to hold the United States accountable for bringing on the depression.

Let me quote that sentence again:

> The United States has been one of the most serious offenders in this commercial warfare.

Mr. President, prior to the Tariff Act of 1928 there had been no tariff act in this country since 1922. We have not disturbed a rate; so far as I know, we had done practically nothing with respect to the administrative provisions of our laws; and yet there is written at large in the record the actions of other governments with respect to tariff increases. I shall not detain the Senate to deal with them in detail; but I hold in my hand Senate Document No. 33 of the first session of the Seventy-first Congress. It is entitled "Tariff Increases in Various Countries, 1922 to 1928, Inclusive."

It is a partial summary of a manuscript entitled "Tariff Increases Throughout the World, 1919 to 1928", and that summary was an official statement by the accredited officers of our Government.

This document discloses that between 1922 and 1928 practically every other nation in the world was engaged in the operation of increasing its tariff duties. It discloses that the general duties were raised almost as much as once a year by some governments. It discloses, moreover, that special duties were increased almost as often as every year by other nations.

Austria, for instance, increased her duties in 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, and 1927. Those were general acts; and by special acts on special items they made increases in 1922, 1924, 1925, and 1926.

Poland offers another good example.

They made general increases in a great number of rates in 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, and 1928. They increased special rates on one or more particular items in 1926, 1927, and 1928. At a time when we were standing still with respect to tariff increases the people of the continental European area and other parts of the world were increasing their duties almost annually in a great trade war among themselves, reflecting, I believe, to some extent the antipathies which grew out of the World War, and the desire to make themselves self-sufficient and independent. Those people were adding item upon item, and duty upon duty, almost every year.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. FESS. While in each of the tariff bills there were increases on individual articles above the rates that then existed, is the Senator aware that, taking the average of the increases, the successive bills have contained lower rates than the preceding bills?

Mr. STEIWER. In America I think that is true.

Mr. FESS. That is what I mean.

Mr. STEIWER. Oh, yes; in America I think that is true, but it is not at all true as to most of the great foreign nations.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no; but in the case of our country, as to the duties that are being complained of, it is true that on some items they have been increased; but on the average there has been a decrease.

Mr. STEIWER. I think that is true, Mr. President.

In furtherance of what I am saying, let me point out that according to a recent compilation based upon the 1933 year book of foreign commerce published by the United States Department of Commerce, the customs revenue per capita in the United States was $2.24. Now, let us make a comparison with some of the other countries that are running these competitive races in the matter of duties and trade restrictions and the commercial warfare in which the world has been engaged. While our per capita customs revenue was $2.24, that of Great Britain and Northern Ireland was $17.70; in Canada, $9.33; in Austria, $13.48; in New Zealand, $19.67; and in various other countries, including the continental European countries, we find per capita customs revenues varying from $12.95 down to, in some exceptional cases, a very small amount.

In this list we find that the United States is lower than the other countries of the world, with a very limited number of exceptions, including the Asiatic countries, and including Peru, Mexico, Bolivia, and I think one or two others. Outside of those relatively minor countries, the United States was collecting at the customhouse less per capita revenue by many multiples than the great competing commercial nations of the world.

Mr. President, that is not all. At the same time we were refraining from tariff increases, we were refraining from the enactment of those restrictions which operate more effectually than tariffs to prevent foreign trade. I am talking about devices like quota restrictions, import permits, restrictions on foreign-exchange transactions, and things of that kind.

I read now for a moment from a book, entitled "Regulation of Tariffs in Foreign Countries by Administrative Action," compiled by the United States Tariff Commission, under date of March 1934.

> Quotas or import permits are generally established and regulated by the Executive, either under special legislative authorization or under general executive powers. These permits may be used to control trade balances or to apply retaliatory measures, and the apportionment of imports under quotas may also be used to conclude and enforce reciprocal trade arrangements. Among the countries where import quotas are used for one purpose or another are:
> Austria, Belgium, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Netherlands, Poland, Rumania, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, and the United Kingdom.

I quote further:

> Restrictions on foreign-exchange transactions are applied in many countries, almost necessarily by the Executive. In several European and Latin American countries control of foreign-exchange transactions is officially exercised through the central banking system. Among the countries applying restrictions for control of foreign exchange are:
> Argentina, Austria, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Ecuador, Estonia, Greece, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Norway, Paraguay, Spain, Turkey, Uruguay, Yugoslavia.

Without reading further from the summary, the fact appears that almost all the nations of the earth have offended against the free movement of foreign trade and the interchange of commodities in trade by resorting to various quota and exchange restrictions—almost every country in the world save one, and that is the country which did not increase its tariff duties from 1922 to 1928.

In this summary is the outline of the various actions taken by several countries of the world in establishing this superstructure of extraordinary restrictive requirements, which have had something to do with the break-down of international trade.

I shall not take time to read further from this compilation. I have noted 16 different nations, including some of the leading nations of the world. It is fair to say that the material set forth in this report, and which I will omit reading, shows that in practically every year from 1923 up to 1933 these countries were applying progressively, more and more, various kind of barriers upon trade, more and more were they subjecting international trade not only to the necessity of paying duties at the customhouse, but they were applying these artificial, absolute barriers, amounting in many cases to embargoes, under which, by governmental action, they limited that which the other nations might bring within their borders.

Mr. President, an interesting thing is the effort of some of the nations to relieve themselves from the enormous burden of these restrictions.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, what the Senator has just cited is one of the principal arguments urged in favor of the pending bill.

Mr. STEIWER. That is quite correct, it is an argument advanced in behalf of the bill, but, as will presently appear, the United States has never resorted to this kind of barrier against imports. We have not set up these restrictions. We have dealt only in duties, and we maintained our duty level from 1922 to 1928, and again from 1928 until 1932, except for a very little application, as the Senator knows, of the flexible provision, and except for the excise taxes of 1932.

I was saying that a very interesting chapter is the effort of foreign nations to relieve themselves from these restrictive influences. I have in my hand a summary of a number of the trade treaties entered into by foreign governments. Let us see what one or two of them show.

Take, for instance, the arrangement between France and Spain. In the arrangement France granted specified quotas on imports from Spain of certain livestock, certain fruits, fresh vegetables, canned tomatoes, certain hides, certain frozen, dried, and conserved fish, wines, and a few other products.

Spain granted specified import quotas on a list of products from France, including charcoal, certain internal-combustion engines, toilet soaps, motorcycles, salted codfish, and fresh eggs.

In addition, Spain granted reduced rates of duty for specified quotas of a list of products of French origin, including telephone line insulators, saws, oak and chestnut extracts.

We find that the German Nation, by German Government decree of March 4, 1934, in its effort to conciliate other nations and to tear down these barriers, had entered orders affecting numerous items, and I read them because of their importance:

> Item 28. Raw or cleaned cotton, flax, hemp, ramie, jute, manila hemp, and other vegetable textile materials; items 438 to 443, worked cotton and cotton yarns; items 144 to 146, sheep's wool, raw or washed, horsehair and other animal hair; items 413 to 425, wool and other animal hair, worked, including yarns thereof; items 470 to 482, other vegetable textile materials, worked, including yarns thereof; and item 453, unbleached cotton fabrics, weighing 80 grams or more per square meter.

In this great story of the reciprocal-trade arrangements made between nations, and their efforts, by concessions and mutual agreements, to break down the barriers erected against them and against their trade, we find almost the complete category of items which are covered in international commerce. We find so complete a list of items that it is substantially correct to say that it is the whole category, it is the whole list, with some little exception, of all the goods that nations sell to and buy from each other.

Mr. President, when we think in terms of restrictions, and when we are talking about the part the United States has played in restrictions upon international trade, I think it well worth while to read from what was said by the Tariff Commission in response to Senate Resolution 325. I quote as follows:

> Accordingly, and because the United States has had in effect no reciprocity treaty which caused serious discriminations against European countries, those countries (except France) have generally been content to accord to the United States all their lowest rates of duty, even when not under treaty obligation to do so.

But that is not all, Mr. President. I find in a recent report from the Tariff Commission this language attributed to the French Foreign Office:

> In consideration of the fact that on the one hand the American Government has not instituted any special measure in restriction of imports, and considering on the other hand, in a spirit of particular amity toward the United States, that there is reason for not altering Franco-American commercial relations at a time when the American Government is itself occupied in solving serious economic problems, the French Government has decided not to denounce the arrangement of May 31, 1932.

And thus, Mr. President, the Tariff Commission, by its report, acquits the United States of the charge of having erected tariff barriers against the importation of goods from foreign nations. The French Foreign Office acquits the United States of responsibility on that score. There is not any room for argument about it. Of all the nations in the world the one that has offended the least is our own country of America.

The one, Mr. President, that has abstained from excesses with respect to the creation of tariff walls and with respect to these so-called "restrictions", like exchange quotas and limitations on imports, by license or otherwise—the Nation that above all others has dealt fairly with her neighbors is the United States of America.

I call attention to this record because, as I say, one of the arguments offered in behalf of this bill is that the trade of the world has been destroyed by the trade restrictions, and I quote again the argument that "the United States has been one of the most serious offenders in this commercial warfare." It simply is not true. It is a defamatory statement against the great name of our great country. This statement would have surprised had it been made by a representative or high official of a foreign nation. It is doubly surprising when this statement is written into the RECORD of the Congress of the United States by an outstanding, responsible Member of this body.

A little while ago I was asked by the Senator from Wyoming what there was in the situation that indicated that the Democratic Party was renouncing its own traditions, abandoning its own position, that it is faithless to its own policy, and that it is turning this important subject over to the President to be handled in a way different from the declarations made in the various platforms and by the great leaders of the Democratic Party. One source of information concerning this bill and its purpose is found in the message of the President of the United States when the bill was transmitted to us for our consideration. The President said:

> The exercise of the authority which I propose must be carefully weighed in the light of the latest information, so as to give assurance that no sound and important American interest will be injuriously disturbed.

I invite attention to that language. Inasmuch as there is no formula governing the conduct of the President under the authority delegated by this bill, who is to determine what constitutes a sound interest in America? What is to determine that save the judgment of the President himself? Who is to determine what constitutes an important interest in America, and what is to determine that save the opinion of the President himself?

Mr. President, in my mind the statement just read implies that the President has in mind, in order to work out his planned economy or some new scheme of social reform, that there will be modifications of tariff duties which will be injurious to some of the elements of our society. It is obviously implied that the President in explaining the injury to result from the application of the proposed treaties is trying to assure us that the injury will not fall upon those industries which he regards as sound, nor upon those interests which he regards as important.

I am mindful in this regard of what was said by the President upon another occasion. In his message of May 10, when he transmitted the economy bill to the Congress, he included this assuring statement. I read:

> When a great danger threatens our basic security it is my duty to advise the Congress of the way to preserve it. In so doing I must be fair not only to the few but to the many. It is in this spirit that I appeal to you. If the Congress chooses to vest me with this responsibility, it will be exercised in the spirit of justice to all, of sympathy to those who are in need and of maintaining inviolate the basic welfare of the United States.

Mr. President, it would be distasteful to me to characterize unpleasantly the President or his conduct under the authority of the bill that he obtained by the language which I have just read. I shall not, therefore, characterize it, but I will say that before 3 months passed this Congress passed Public, No. 78, which changed some of the rules that the President had made under the Economy Act, and declared that to that extent the Congress did not regard those rules as sympathetic or as reflecting a spirit of justice to all. And within a year or a little over a year, two-thirds of both bodies of Congress, by another act, made another solemn declaration that they were dissatisfied with the President's administration of the great powers that had been delegated to him by the Economy Act.

And so, Mr. President, we ought to have been warned when the President said to us, "In so doing I must be fair not only to the few but to the many"; we ought to have been warned that the President had in mind to make drastic cuts and to apply the kind of treatment that we might not approve in order to serve what he regarded as the welfare of the great body of our people; and we ought now, by the same token, to be warned here, because now the President says to us:

> The exercise of the authority which I propose must be carefully weighed in the light of the latest information so as to give assurance that no sound and important American interest will be injuriously disturbed.

Thus we have presented a proposal under which the President very frankly tells the Congress that in order to expand our foreign trade he will take steps that will not injuriously disturb sound investment or important elements of our society; but the inevitable implication is that the acts which he will perform will disturb the unimportant and the unsound, and we write no formula to determine what the President shall do in playing with a great toy which is built and painted and delivered to him under this bill.

Mr. President, I have said the Democratic Party is delegating an authority which will permit departure from its traditional historical position; that it will permit every theory of tariff that has ever been maintained by that party to be violated either by the President or by someone acting for him. Who will advise the President in this regard? One body that will advise him, no doubt, is the Tariff Commission, and the amiable Mr. O'Brien, who has intimated that he will do whatever the President wants him to do with respect to tariff matters. Another adviser will be the Secretary of Agriculture. Another adviser, no doubt, will be Dr. Tugwell.

Earlier in the afternoon there was a statement read, attributed to Dr. Tugwell, in which he announced that he was against protection in its entirety.

Let us see about Secretary Wallace, one of the other advisers of the President, who is helping to formulate the program, and to lead America into its new theory—he is helping also to lead the Democratic Party away from its traditions, and helping to commit that party to a new venture and to a new experiment as a part of the new deal. Mr. Wallace, in his book, America Must Choose, said this:

> A truly practical readjustment of our own tariff policy would involve the careful examination of every product produced in the United States or imported, and the determination of just which of our monopolistic or inefficient industries we are willing to expose to real foreign competition. This problem should be approached from the point of view of a long-time national plan which we are willing to follow for at least 20 or 30 years, even if some of our friends get hurt, and howl continuously to high heaven.

Those are deliberate words; words deliberately chosen by one of those who is to be an adviser of the President of the United States in making the new program in carrying forward the new experiment under the new power to be delegated by the pending bill.

In the same book, at page 18, Mr. Wallace said, and I quote further:

> Traditionally the Democratic Party is the party of low tariffs. Actually Democratic administrations have never made changes in the tariff structure great enough to increase foreign purchasing power to the extent demanded by the present world dilemma. If we are going to increase foreign purchasing power enough to sell abroad our normal surpluses of cotton, wheat, and tobacco at a decent price, we shall have to accept nearly a billion dollars more goods from abroad than we did in 1929. We shall have to get that much more in order to service the debts that are coming to us from abroad and have enough left over to pay us a fair price for what we send abroad.

Mr. President, at this point I observe that when Mr. Wallace estimated that we must import $1,000,000,000 more than in a certain year, he took the year 1929, which, of course, is the peak year of importation in the whole history of the Republic. He would have us go back to that basis of importation. Then he would have us add $1,000,000,000 to it in order to benefit somebody else and to enable foreigners to buy some of our goods.

I quote further:

> This will involve a radical reduction in tariffs. That might seriously hurt certain industries, and a few kinds of agricultural businesses, such as sugar-beet growing and flax growing. It might also cause pain for a while to woolgrowers, and to farmers who supply material for various edible oils. I think we ought to face that fact. If we are going to lower tariffs radically, there may have to be some definite planning whereby certain industries or businesses will have to be retired. The Government might have to help furnish means for the orderly retirement of such businesses, and even select those which are thus to be retired.

When Mr. Wallace refers to certain farmers who supply materials for various edible oils he obviously is referring to farmers engaged in the great dairying industry.

In March of this year Mr. Wallace was quoted in the New York Times. I read from a statement appearing March 6, 1934, in that paper, as follows:

Similarly, Mr. Wallace pointed out, lower tariffs and the removal of artificial trade barriers would leave some weak and inefficiently managed American industries at the mercy of foreign competition. Agreeing that this might lead to added unemployment, especially in the Massachusetts mill towns, he said this increase would not exceed 10 percent.

Think of it, Mr. President. A responsible officer of our Government talking brazenly about a course of procedure that will bring injury to our business, that will curtail our employment, saying it is not so bad because the increase in unemployment will not exceed 10 percent. I do not know what he would call a serious blow to the American Nation and to the laborers of the country under the conditions which obtain in this year of our Lord 1934. I am glad he has made no proposal here that he would call an important reduction in employment or a substantial increase of unemployment.

Mr. President, in the message of the President with respect to the pending legislation there is another argument offered in behalf of the bill. It is as follows:

If the American Government is not in a position to make fair offers for fair opportunities, its trade will be superseded. If it is not in a position at a given moment rapidly to alter the terms on which it is willing to deal with other countries, it cannot adequately protect its trade against discrimination and against bargains injurious to its interests. Furthermore, a promise to which prompt effect cannot be given is not an inducement which can pass current at par in commercial negotiations.

This argument, Mr. President, might be summarized as an argument of expedition. In effect it amounts to this, that it is impossible for the President or the representatives of our Government to act successfully in behalf of American industry unless they can act with dispatch. The argument is offered that they must proceed expeditiously, the President suggesting that he must have an unrestrained power, to make their foreign-trade agreements.

The purpose, of course, is to get away from necessity of ratification by the Senate. The argument of expedition is an argument to sustain the idea that the President should have the power, free and unrestrained, to do whatever he may please to do in furtherance of his own judgment and in accordance with his own opinion as to what should be done in promoting the foreign trade of the United States.

It is not a fair or valid argument to say, under present conditions and in this administration, that there is any lack of dispatch or expedition in getting congressional support for the important measures which the President submits.

If we can cooperate with the Executive in matters of gravest import, involving the fundamental existence of the Nation, and trenching upon the basic constitutional powers of Congress; in matters that pertain to the happiness and welfare of all the people of the land; if, with respect to that kind of legislation, we can act within a month or two, how easily, how readily we would be able to deal with a mere trade agreement made by the President if there were no valid or substantial objection to it.

The history of trade agreements in this country has not disclosed so much that the Senate was not expeditious in its action as it has disclosed that the Senate, reflecting the will of the people, in very many instances refused outright to give approval to the treaty. The thing involved in this controversy is not expedition; it is the question of whether or not approval is going to be had at all.

I read from the letter of the Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission in response to Senate Resolution 325, in which he refers to the history of reciprocity treaties. From pages 11 and 12 I read as follows:

It appears therefore that in a period of some 60 years, 10 reciprocity treaties were negotiated under the general treaty powers which did not become effective. Out of the 10, two were rejected by the foreign country, two were negotiated by one President but not accepted by his successor, and the other six were suppressed by congressional action or inaction—four were rejected by the Senate, one failed for lack of the necessary legislation, and one because amendment by the Senate had made it unacceptable to the other country.

On the same page, at another place, I quote as follows:

It may be seen that it has been a matter of some difficulty and delicacy to obtain reciprocity treaties which would satisfy both parties to the treaty. During the last century with three exceptions, all attempts on the part of the United States to complete reciprocity treaties have been abortive. The scattered successes have been with near neighbors and have been enacted perhaps as much for political as for economic reasons. Out of 21 abortive treaties, 16 failed because of opposition in the Senate—a two-thirds majority being required for ratification—being either rejected or allowed to die without a vote.

Thus, Mr. President, I conclude my remarks in connection with this argument of expedition. In my judgment, it is no sounder than the conception entertained by foreign interests, and by internationalists in this country, and by some of the sponsors of this bill, that America is one of the most serious offenders in the matter of the erection of trade barriers.

Now let us look at the third argument.

In the House report, which is one of the most authoritative statements made in behalf of this bill, we find the contention that world trade has shrunk 30 percent in volume from the 1929 level, and the further statement that one of the primary causes for this great shrink in volume is the almost universal existence of high trade barriers. First, Mr. President, they wrongfully blame the United States for the existence of the high trade barriers. Having done that, they contend that the high trade barriers are one of the primary causes of this shrink.

We know something of the causes of the shrink in trade. We know what happened in the year 1929 and the years following that year. We know the great chaotic condition that developed in the world. We know, moreover, that the peak of foreign trade in 1929 had been attained under these same very severe trade restrictions. It had surmounted the difficulties of the so-called "trade barriers"; and then in 1929, without a substantial change in the trade barriers, all at once we found ourselves headed for chaos. Some of the economists assign one reason and some another.

I shall not attempt at this late hour to analyze the reasons for the world depression. Undoubtedly the excessive expansion of credit, the assumption of debts that could not be paid, the load of interest, excessive speculation, and all the other causes, including monetary disorders and dislocation of exchanges, were factors. The mechanization of industry, antipathies between nations, the ill feeling following the Treaty of Versailles, the desire of all the nations to make themselves independent and to abstain from trade—these and a dozen other forces were the great factors that brought about the chaotic condition during and following the year 1929.

I shall not deny that the trade barriers were a factor. I have no doubt they contributed to some extent. I wish the European nations had not engaged in the competitive race in which they did engage to establish the excessively high tariffs and the trade barriers that I discussed earlier in these remarks. I am happy to concede, for the sake of the argument, that those barriers were a factor operating against the free exchange of commerce in the trade between the nations; but to say that they are the primary cause is to overstate the case, and to present a misleading argument in behalf of this bill. I should rather regard them as effects. They flow from antipathies between peoples, from the desire to remain independent and self-sufficient. They are an effect more than a cause; but as a cause they are a secondary and not a primary cause, and they are not the dominant reason why the great depression came upon the world in the year 1929.

I have in my hand a statement by the Secretary of State made in April of this year, and made, I believe, as a press release in behalf of the enactment of this measure. In that statement the Secretary of State, among other things, is quoted as follows:

When the processes of exchange and distribution collapsed in 1929, a world-wide decline of commodity prices and of values rapidly resulted in some localities and gradually in others. International trade collapsed, while production in our own country precipitately declined 45 percent and domestic trade substantially over 50 percent.

There, Mr. President, is the answer to the argument that the trade barriers were the primary cause of the collapse in world trade. Not even the Secretary of State believes that the argument is sound; and he points out that there was a collapse of practically 50 percent in the domestic trade of our own country, where there were no trade barriers in the commerce among the several States. So it is obvious that that contention, like others, is a misdirected effort and a misleading argument in behalf of the bill.

Mr. President, Mr. Wallace, in his book, America Must Choose, made this statement:

The failure to adopt any nationally approved plan during the post-war years has, of course, been disastrous for all of our major producing groups, but it has been most disastrous in its effect on agriculture. The loss of billions of dollars of agricultural income can be charged directly to this cause. The foreign loans we made to sustain our expanded productive capacity after the war, merely concealed the true nature of our situation. When the loans ended—as they were sure to, since we refused to accept sufficient goods in payment—our artificial market for the surplus disappeared overnight.

Here is one statement made by the Secretary of Agriculture which has my cordial approval. The fact of the entire matter was that we were extending excessive credit to the nations of the world in the years prior to 1929. By that extension of credit, we built up a great international trade, to the peak of 1929, and when we withdrew the credit, naturally our trade levels subsided. Who, therefore, in the face of the record, would be justified in saying that the great disaster which came upon our country came because of the trade barriers, which, after all, existed chiefly in the foreign countries operating one against the other, and only to a very slight degree operated against us in our trade with those countries.

It would be interesting, if time permitted, to analyze our trade loss. It has been argued in the House report and the argument was made here by the Senator from Mississippi that we lost more than our share; that is to say, that we have not retained our proportionate share of the diminishing world market. That statement is found, I think, on page 3 of the House committee report.

Without analyzing that contention in detail, let us deal with it in a few sentences. American international trade, greater than that of any other nation in the world, consists of trade in crude commodities. It is disclosed by examination of figures as to the loss of trade that there has been a greater loss in the crude commodities than in manufactured commodities in value. Therefore, our trade, which showed a very high percentage of crude commodities, or raw materials, in the very nature of things was to suffer more than the trade of some other nations.

Moreover, we were injuriously affected by the adverse exchange rate, because until the fall of 1933 we had taken no steps to correct the inequalities in exchange rates, and, of all the nations in the world, our adherence to the gold standard and to our monetary value made us the greatest sufferers. For that reason we were seriously affected in our attempt to compete in world trade by the fact that other nations, with their depreciated currencies, were able to undersell us, to take our markets, and to destroy our trade.

I submit that this factor of international exchange, and this other factor of the withdrawal of credit, and other factors, economic or monetary in nature, were the causes which reduced our proportionate share of the trade of the world, and that it was not due to import restrictions on our trade, nor was it due to certain trade restrictions which operated against us in other quarters of the world.

Further, we find a certain degree of error in the statement contained in the House report. Even if it be admitted that trade restrictions were responsible, and that our tariff policy brought about a greater proportion of loss in the diminishing trade of the world, a comparison of the share of world trade held by the leading countries of the world for the years 1913 and 1932 is very revealing.

Let us leave out the abnormal year 1929; let us lay aside for a moment the great peak year, during which we had increased our foreign trade far above normal by our lending policy. Let us go back to the long-time period, and compare the fairly normal year 1913 with the year 1932.

We find, in amount of change as between the years 1913 and 1932, that the United States had suffered a loss of 0.23 of 1 percent of its share of the world trade, the United Kingdom had lost 1.85 percent of its share of the world trade, and Germany, in the same period, due, I have no doubt, to the influence of the war, had suffered a loss of 3.83 percent of its share of the world trade. So, if we take a normal comparison between the year 1913 and the year 1932, we find that the loss of world trade as suffered by the United States was not disproportionate; that, in fact, it was less than the loss of Germany, of the United Kingdom, and of the other great industrial nations of the world.

An additional argument is made that the world trade can be regained only by taking away the trade restrictions, and that becomes the excuse or apology for the pending bill. I want to analyze briefly the proposition as to whether the difficulty can be overcome by the means prescribed in the bill.

We have had one recent experience in the matter of administering quotas. We attempted, when the prohibition law was repealed, to put the importation of foreign liquors on a quota basis and to expand our foreign trade by means of a quota system with respect to liquor.

I wish to read from the New York Times of March 10 in order to disclose something of the results of that limited experiment.

Mr. President, it is needless to add that, compared with the possibilities under the pending bill, this experiment with the liquor quotas was a primitive, simple experiment, and it was undertaken in a very limited way.

I read from the paper referred to:

The set-up by which the quotas were granted and questions in connection with them were settled was apparently to complicated and led to unreasonable delays.

The State Department was visited by streams of disgruntled diplomats almost daily seeking to know why their countries had not received larger quotas, why their quotas were being delayed, and so on.

At least one country, Germany, seriously raised the question of violation of the most-favored-nation clause in its trade treaty signed by this country in 1925.

Originally adopted in the belief that handsome trade concessions could be obtained by bargaining liquor quotas against import allowances for American products the system has been a disappointment from that point of view.

Outside of an increased quota on apples and pears into France and American tobacco into Spain, hardly any concessions of importance have been obtained in the 4 months the liquor system has been in effect.

And we all know that the system was discontinued.

Mr. President, I am not qualified to speak in connection with our sales of tobacco into Spain, but I happen to know something about our efforts to increase our apple sales abroad by the use of the liquor quota. I have in my hand a letter written by a responsible officer of the International Apple Association. The letter was written to me, because it concerns some of the apple products in the Pacific Northwest. I read briefly from the letter:

While the French Ambassador gave written assurance to our Department of State that the import quota of 200,000 quintals would be effective, it is difficult to see how those assurances can be enforced.

Right now time is the essence of the apple and pear deals. The quarter January 1 to April 1 is of vital importance.

The negotiations as concluded have paralyzed the deal both in France and the United States so far as exports to France are concerned.

If the French assurances are thrown into the field of diplomatic negotiations to persuade the French Government to make the 200,000 quintals effective, the exporting season will be over.

The way the matter now stands the apple and pear industries are apparently worse off than before the negotiations.

I am advised, Mr. President, in connection with this subject, that large cargoes of apples and pears that were admitted into France under the quotas were nevertheless not purchased by the consumers, and they rotted at the docks and the warehouses, and the American shippers suffered very great losses in this experiment to offset agricultural allowances against liquor import quotas.

On this point we must bear in mind one fact that has never been denied, namely, that the great industrial nations do not sell always one to the other. In the highest sense they are competitive. They are manufacturing and selling the same thing.

Whether we take machinery, automobiles, cotton manufactures, woolen manufactures, or a half a dozen others of the leading products of the great nations of the world, we find that we are not shipping one to the other. We are manufacturing these articles and exporting them abroad, but we are all engaged in selling in a common competitive territory to people of other nations.

This argument, I think, has not been developed in these debates, but it appears very clearly from the records which have been accumulated by our Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce and by the Federal Tariff Commission and by other agencies of our Government.

Because we are competitively engaged with the other industrial and agricultural nations of the world, we and they have nothing to trade. America and the United Kingdom are still competitively selling in common territories to the peoples of other nations the same article, of much the same character, at a competitive price. If we were selling to each other, we might bargain our markets into a better position by making a deal with the United Kingdom that they take a certain proportion of our product in return for our taking a certain proportion of theirs, or if they make a certain concession with respect to their tariffs in return for our making a concession with respect to ours. But where we are engaged in a competitive enterprise under which we both try to sell in a common territory to other peoples, how can we hope to gain by concessions between ourselves and the United Kingdom. We might by agreement get Britain to withdraw from the other markets. We might get them to abstain from competition.

But we would have to go that far—no less—before we could hope to obtain any trade agreements dealing with competitive enterprises in which we are all engaged. Unfortunately, the great nations of the world with which we compete produce and sell the bulk of the world's goods. They supply the bulk of the world's consumption. They leave very little in the field fairly within the operations of foreign-trade agreements. It will be found that a great portion of all the production of the world is clear outside the possibility of negotiating trade agreements with other competing nations.

I shall not detain the Senate with the development of that argument, but I wish to say with very complete confidence that the record of our trade and the trade of Germany, France, Japan, and England sustains the statement, and will convince any person willing to consider the subject that there is a very limited field in which the proposed agreements could operate.

One final argument made in behalf of the bill is that the executive branch of virtually all the other important trading countries has the power under the existing law to make these trade agreements, and therefore that we, in order to compete with the other countries, must give to our executive branch the same flexible and completely dominant authority. I answer that by making just one reference. I turn to the report on this bill as made by the House Committee on Ways and Means, and at page 5 of that report we find that argument developed. The statement is as follows:

> In most European countries agreements can be made by the executive and put into force at once. In some countries no parliamentary ratification of any kind is necessary. In the majority of countries parliamentary ratification is necessary, but the agreements can be made operative at once and parliamentary ratification is largely a matter of form.

In connection with this subject Mr. Sayre, of the State Department, appeared before the committee, and in the record of the hearings he indulged in a statement, to which I call attention because to me it completely refutes the whole argument and shows that with the exception of three countries the statement upon which the argument is advanced is unsound in fact and unsound in effect. He said among other things, as follows:

> Practically all of the countries of continental Europe, as well as England and the major dominions and a few of the countries of Latin America, have authority vested in the executive branch of the Government for negotiating duties below those in the general or maximum tariff schedules, in the course of reciprocal negotiations with other countries.
> In a few cases (notably France, Spain, Portugal, Canada, and South Africa), the Parliament has actually established in advance the minimum scale of duties, part or all of which may be granted to other countries by agreements, although in practice rates below the so-called "minimum" have sometimes been granted by France and Spain. The more common practice is to start with a general tariff and authorize the executive branch of the Government to grant reductions in the course of negotiations, without prescribing in advance the amount of the reductions, such rates established by treaty then constituting the second or conventional column of the country's tariff.
> In a limited number of countries the Executive has the authority to make definitely effective the reductions granted in the course of reciprocal negotiations, without requiring the approval of the Parliament. (This is the case principally in Canada, British India, with Hungary requiring simple notification to the Parliament. * * *)

This, Mr. President, is an answer to the argument. After all is said to the effect that the other nations are practicing a system something equivalent to that set up in this bill, we find upon examination of the facts that of all the nations in the world there are only three in which the executive enjoys the unbounded power given to the President in this bill.

Either there is a legislative definition or a limit upon what may be done, or else there is a requirement for ratification by the legislative branch of the Government. So I say that argument also falls along with the rest.

Now to summarize: The various arguments presented with some rather minor exceptions, are the only arguments that have been advanced; they are the only arguments that appear in the House report or the Senate report, in the statement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and other authoritative statements in behalf of the bill. All combined do not begin to justify the enactment of this legislation.

Nor is the legislation necessary. We can in other ways solve our trade problems if we have the will to do so. We can proceed under the Constitution and under existing law. Our President can negotiate all the agreements that will be of any substantial benefit to the people of the United States, and ratification can be had by the Senate. It is not necessary to resort to the expedients which are created in the proposed statute. It is not necessary to rely upon arguments of doubtful validity, committing us to a doubtful course, sending us out upon an uncharted sea, involving us in commitments of a nature which we cannot know or evaluate in advance.

Mr. President, I submit that it is wholly unnecessary to create in this country the uncertainty and the doubt that would come to the business minds of the people of America if the President were clothed with these extraordinary and unlimited powers. It is unnecessary and unwise to leave our charted course for this new and novel experiment.

I said in the beginning that I knew my remarks would have no influence upon the action to be taken here, and I expressed the hope that some faint echo of my utterances might be heard by people elsewhere. Let me say now, in conclusion, that if the American people will give the subject the attention which its importance deserves, they will come to the conclusion very promptly that in this legislation there is a threat against their welfare and against their security.

I prophesy the day will come when they, in the assertion of their rights as free citizens, will demand of the Congress that we recall the extraordinary powers which we are delegating to others, and that we thus restore to the people's representatives the functions of government which are rightfully performed by the Congress. Compliance with that demand will bring us back to the Constitution under which our country has grown so great.

NATIONAL ARCHIVES COMMISSION

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, today the Committee on the Library ordered reported a bill establishing a commission for the new Department of Archives. The House had previously passed a bill and the Senate passed a substitute bill relating to the same subject. I think it is one of the most important matters that has been before the Senate for some time. For the convenience of Senators, the matter being of such great importance, I ask unanimous consent that the two bills may be printed in parallel columns in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is not asking for action on the bill at this time?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD in parallel columns, as follows:

HOUSE BILL 8910 AS PASSED THE HOUSE

[H.R. 8910]

An act to establish a National Archives of the United States Government, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established a commission to be known as the "National Archives Commission", to be composed of the Secretaries of each of the executive departments of the Government (or an alternate from each department to be named by the Secretary thereof), the Chairman of each of the Senate and House Committees on the Library, the Librarian of Congress, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Archivist of the United States.

SEC. 2. There is hereby created and established the National Archives, which is hereafter to be known as the "National Archives of the United States", for the purpose of receiving, preserving, and supervising the use of certain Government papers and records as set out in sections 3 and 4 of this act. The head of the National Archives shall be known as the "Archivist of the United States", who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The archivist is authorized to appoint, solely on their fitness and aptitude for their duties, such assistants, officers, and other employees as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 3. The source of material to be transferred to the National Archives of the United States (hereinafter referred to as the "National Archives") shall consist of records, documents, and manuscripts now in the custody of or having their origin in the executive departments, independent offices, and any and all other agencies of the Federal Government.

SEC. 4. The National Archives Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "commission") shall define the classes of material which may be transferred to the National Archives and establish rules and regulations governing such transfer. The executive departments, independent offices, and other governmental agencies shall, in all cases, submit in advance to the archivist descriptive lists, or inventories, of the records to be transferred to the National Archives.

SEC. 5. All materials and records within the definition of

HOUSE BILL 8910 AS REPORTED TO THE SENATE

[H.R. 8910]

An act to establish a National Archives of the United States Government, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created the Office of Archivist of the United States, the archivist to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. The salary of the archivist shall be $8,000 annually. All persons to be employed in the National Archives Establishment shall be appointed by the archivist solely with reference to their fitness for their particular duties and without regard to civil service law; and the archivist shall make rules and regulations for the government of the National Archives; but any official or employee with salary of $5,000 or over shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 3. All archives or records belonging to the Government of the United States (legislative, executive, judicial, and other) shall be under the charge and superintendence of the archivist to this extent: He shall have full power to inspect personally or by deputy the records of any agency of the United States Government whatsoever and wheresoever located, to secure the full cooperation of any and all persons in charge of such records in such inspections and in the execution of such measures as may be deemed necessary for the better preservation of the material, and to requisition for transfer to the National Archives Establishment such archives, or records as the National Archives Commission, hereafter provided shall approve for such transfer, and he shall have authority to make regulations for the arrangement, custody, use, and withdrawal of material deposited in the National Archives Building.

SEC. 4. The immediate custody and control of the National Archives Building and such other buildings, grounds, and equipment as may from time to time become a part of the National Archives Establishment (except as the same is vested by law in the Director of National Buildings, Parks, and Reservations) and their contents shall be vested in the Archivist of the United States.

HOUSE BILL 8910 AS PASSED THE HOUSE—continued

the commission may, subject to the approval of the departments, offices, and agencies from which it is to be drawn, be transferred at any time and without regard to the date of such material and records, on requisition of the archivist: Provided, That after 5 years from the beginning of this commission the approval of the departments, offices, and agencies from which such material is to be drawn shall not be necessary, except in the case of material bearing dates within 50 years prior to the then dates, and thereafter within 50 years prior to the date of requisition.

SEC. 6. (a) The archivist shall store, classify, arrange, list, index, or catalog all matter received by him, repair and bind the same when needed, and perform all other activities judged needful for the proper administration of his office and the preservation and service of the record property in his custody. In consultation with the commission, the archivist shall prescribe rules and regulations governing examination and consultation of the record property in his custody as he may deem wise: Provided, That any head of an executive department, independent office, or other agency of the Government may, for limited periods, not exceeding in duration his tenure of that office, exempt from examination and consultation by officials, private individuals, or any other persons such confidential matter transferred from his department or office, as he may deem wise.

(b) The National Archives may also accept, store, and preserve motion-picture films and sound recordings pertaining to and illustrative of historical activities of the United States and in connection therewith maintain a projecting room for showing such films and reproducing such sound recordings for historical purposes and study.

SEC. 7. (a) The commission is hereby authorized to appoint a committee to advise on publishing historical material, such committee to be known as the "Committee on National Historical Publications." The membership of this committee shall consist of the Archivist of the United States (who shall be chairman); the Historical Adviser of the Department of State; the Chief of the Historical Section of the War Department, General Staff; the Superintendent of Naval Records in the Navy Department; the Chief of the Division of Manuscripts in the Library of Congress; the Curator, Division of History, of the Smithsonian Institution; the president of the American Historical Association; and, in addition thereto, two other members, selected from among persons recognized as of high attainment in American history, to serve for a period of 4 years.

(b) The functions of the Committee on National Historical Publications (hereinafter referred to as the "committee") shall be to examine material in the custody of the National

HOUSE BILL 8910 AS REPORTED TO THE SENATE—continued

SEC. 5. That there is hereby created also a National Historical Publications Commission which shall make plans, estimates, and recommendations for such historical works and collections of sources as seem appropriate for publication at the public expense, said commission to consist of the Archivist of the United States, who shall be its chairman; the historical adviser of the Department of State; the chief of the historical section of the War Department, General Staff; the superintendent of naval records in the Navy Department; the Chief of the Division of Manuscripts in the Library of Congress; and two members of the American Historical Association appointed by the president thereof from among those persons who are or have been members of the executive council of the said association: Provided, That the preparation and publication of annual and special reports on the archives and records of the Government, guides, inventory lists, catalogs, and other instruments facilitating the use of the collections shall have precedence over detailed calendars and textual reproductions. This commission shall meet at least once a year, and the members shall serve without compensation except repayment of expenses actually incurred in attending meetings of the commission.

SEC. 6. That there is hereby further created a National Archives Council composed of the Secretaries of each of the executive departments of the Government (or an alternate from each department to be named by the Secretary thereof), the Chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library, the Chairman of the House Committee on the Library, the Librarian of Congress, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Archivist of the United States. The said Council shall define the classes of material which shall be transferred to the National Archives Building and establish regulations governing such transfer; and shall have power to advise the archivist in respect to regulations governing the disposition and use of the archives and records transferred to his custody.

SEC. 7. That the National Archives shall have an official seal which will be judicially noticed.

SEC. 8. That the archivist shall make to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, a report for the preceding fiscal year as to the national archives, the said report including a detailed statement of all accessions and of all receipts and expenditures on account of the said establishment. He shall also transmit to Congress the recommendations of the Commission on National Historical Publications, and, on January 1 of each year, with the approval of the council, a list or description of the papers, documents, etc. (among the archives and records of the Government), which appear to have no permanent value or historical inter-

Archives, advise on the propriety and need for its publication, and submit plans and costs governing such publications as it may deem necessary.

(c) The committee shall also examine available historical material, governmental in origin and character, suitable for motion pictures, for radio broadcast, for sound recording, for lecture, or for any other method of disseminating information, and advise as to plans and costs of preparing such material for the end sought.

(d) The committee shall report to the archivist, who is authorized, with the consent of the commission, to prepare, print, publish, and/or record such material: Provided, That the annual expenditures for such purposes shall not exceed the sum of $20,000.

SEC. 8. The archivist shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. The members of the commission and members of the committee shall receive no salary, but their transportation expenses and expenses incident to not more than two meetings of not more than 6 days' duration each in any 1 year shall be paid out of such funds as are available.

SEC. 9. The National Archives shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

SEC. 10. There is hereby authorized such appropriations as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 11. The archivist shall submit annually to Congress a report for the preceding fiscal year covering accessions, publications, and recordings, and a detailed statement covering all receipts and expenditures.

SEC. 12. All acts or parts of acts relating to the custody, preservation, and disposition of official papers and documents of executive departments and other governmental agencies inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

est, and which, with the concurrence of the Government agency concerned, and subject to the approval of Congress, shall be destroyed or otherwise effectively disposed of.

SEC. 9. That there are hereby authorized such appropriations as may be necessary for the maintenance of the National Archives Building and the administration of the collections, the expenses, and work of the Commission on National Historical Publications, the supply of necessary equipment and expenses incidental to the operations aforesaid, including transfer of records to the Archives Building; printing and binding; personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel and subsistence and per diem in lieu of subsistence, notwithstanding the provisions of any other acts; stenographic services by contract or otherwise as may be deemed necessary; purchases and exchange of books and maps; purchase, exchange, and operation of motor vehicles; and all absolutely necessary contingent expenses, all to be expended under the direction of the archivist, who shall annually submit to Congress estimates therefor in the manner prescribed by law.

SEC. 10. All acts or parts of acts relating to the charge and superintendency, custody, preservation, and disposition of official papers and documents of executive departments and other governmental agencies inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

THE N.R.A.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interview published in the New York Times of May 27, attributed to Mr. William R. Hearst; also a statement appearing in the New York Times under date of May 28 entitled "Give the N.R.A. a Chance", signed by the United States Plywood Co., Inc.; and another article appearing in the same paper having relationship to the regulation of the service industries and the code labor rule.

There being no objection the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 27, 1934]

HEARST, SAILING, SHIFTS TO THE N.R.A.—PUBLISHER, URGING SUPPORT OF PRESIDENT, NOTES RISE IN NATION'S BUSINESS—CITES ADVERTISING GAIN—BELIEVES IN NEW DEAL SO LONG AS "YOU ARE NOT TOLD TO DO SOMETHING YOU CAN'T DO"

William Randolph Hearst, publisher, sailed yesterday on the Italian liner Rex, expressing optimism about conditions in the country and the progress of recovery.

In a virtual reversal of his former attitude, the publisher said he felt that everyone should support the N.R.A. and recovery measures so long as the measures did not "tell you to do something you can't do." He said he was in sympathy with President Roosevelt.

With Mr. Hearst were his three sons, William R., Jr., John, and George, the wives of his sons and 11 of his friends.

The publisher said he believed the United States was well on the way to recovery, citing increases in newspaper advertising as a reliable barometer of conditions throughout the Nation.

HE NOTES GAIN IN TRADE

When asked for his views on the Recovery Act, Mr. Hearst, who talked in Chicago recently with General Johnson, head of the N.R.A., and visited the President in Washington, said:

"It is much better than it was. General Johnson seemed to have a very judicious and admirable attitude. He said that the codes were satisfactory to many industries, which preferred to have them rather than not."

Speaking of his visit to Washington, he said:

"I have sympathy for the National Recovery Act, and all is right with it so long as they don't tell you to do something you can't do. I think we are going to get along, and all should help as much as they can. I am entirely in sympathy with the President."

GIVE THE N.R.A. A CHANCE

Unless the citizens of our beloved country support our President and the Congress no plan—social or economic—can succeed.

In other countries, notably England and Russia, the people have sustained their governments during the crisis with an enthusiasm amounting to religious fervor. Both of these countries are well on their way toward complete recovery.

We lay claim to no knowledge of political or social economics qualifying us to judge the wisdom of the plan of our Government, but we subscribe to the opinion that no plan can succeed without the unselfish and intelligent support of the whole people—that any plan, capable of modification by experience, can succeed if honestly and intelligently supported.

The N.R.A. has revivified the lumber industry in all of its complex phases. It has raised the wages of workmen from as little as nothing, save rude board and keep, to a minimum of 42½ cents an hour. It has benefited the "little man" by protecting him against the dumping of overproduction in his markets; by teaching him the cost of doing business and by stabilizing his market with due consideration to his activities.

Even in this industry the chiselers are at work undermining, for selfish reasons of temporary gain, the structure which has saved them from destruction.

Give the N.R.A. a chance to succeed by giving it your wholehearted, patriotic support. Do not be a traitor to your own interests, for it inevitably means a return to the chaos of 1933 or the lash of the dictator. Your Government has made mistakes, but it has set us on the road to recovery, and has passed many laws to prevent abuses of the past.

The man who will not support his Government in this crisis is beneath contempt.

ROOSEVELT ENDS REGULATION OF THE SERVICE INDUSTRIES BUT KEEPS CODE LABOR RULE—N.R.A. DRASTICALLY REVISED—BUT LOCAL FAIR-PRACTICE PACTS ARE AUTHORIZED IN EXECUTIVE ORDER—85 PERCENT MUST AGREE—OTHERWISE BLUE EAGLE IS PERMITTED IF FOUR BASIC RULES OF THE LAW ARE MET—PRICE CONTROL WAS SNAG—STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT CITES HANDICAPS TO NATIONAL CODES FOR SALE OF SERVICES

WASHINGTON, May 27.—President Roosevelt, in an Executive order today, authorized the exemption of the service industries from some of the fair-trade practices of N.R.A. codes.

The exemption does not apply to minimum wages and maximum working hours, child labor, and collective bargaining.

The Executive order empowers Recovery Administrator Johnson to cease attempting to enforce open-price systems, price fixing, and other devices on hundreds of thousands of cleaners, dyers, and pressers, barber shops, beauty shops, and the like.

In a statement, the President defined service industries as those "engaged in the sale of services rather than goods."

The statement said that "a trial period of some months has shown that while most industries after organization for this work and a little experience with it can secure uniform national results, there are others in which a greater degree of autonomous local self-government is desirable."

Among these are "some but not all" of the service industries, the statement added.

MUCH DIFFICULTY IN FIELD

This latest step toward a changed N.R.A. was taken after General Johnson and his aides had found mounting difficulty in the service-industries field.

The cleaners and dyers code accounted for more than half the Blue Eagles removed. Under the code, a complicated system of minimum prices was set up for various areas in the country.

Wide-spread violation prompted General Johnson to say that he never should have attempted to write fair-trade practice provisions into the pact.

Under the Executive order of today, however, fair-trade practice provisions for a service industry in a given area may be provided when 85 percent of the industry in the area agrees to them and they are approved by the N.R.A.

No member of any service industry may fly the Blue Eagle unless he is living up to the present code provisions governing child labor, maximum hours, minimum wages, and collective bargaining. In areas where a local code has been promulgated, the members of the industry, to fly the Blue Eagle, must, in addition, live up to the local code.

SIGNING DELAYED BY PRESIDENT

The decision on whether an industry is eligible for exemption is left to General Johnson and his aides.

While the step was forecast by General Johnson 3 weeks ago, it is known that the Executive order, presumably drafted by the N.R.A., had been unsigned on the President's desk for almost a week. Some N.R.A. officials had doubted whether he would sign it at all, involving as it does a major change in N.R.A. policy.

Forecasting of the order by General Johnson brought a storm of protest from cleaners and dyers throughout the country.

Since the basic principle of the N.R.A. contemplates meeting the increased production costs of higher wages and shorter working hours with savings by elimination of destructive price cutting and of other practices, much interest in how the new policy would work out was expressed in N.R.A. circles.

N.R.A. officials have for some time recognized a grave problem in handling such codes as come within the scope of today's Executive order. They feel there is little that a code can offer in this field in return for the higher production costs under the N.R.A.

LIST OF GROUPS AFFECTED NOT READY

WASHINGTON, May 27.—The Recovery Administration was not prepared tonight to announce the industries to come under the new order.

Virtually the only service industry operating under a national price schedule is that of cleaning and dyeing.

The hotel code has been suspended for perfection by the code authority. The restaurant group is operating under a national code based mainly on wage and hour provisions.

The laundry and barber-shop groups are operating under codes with fair-trade practice provisions.

THE PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT

WASHINGTON, May 27.—Following are the texts of the President's statement announcing changes in the N.R.A. as it affects service industries and of the Executive order promulgating the changes:

"Most industries have a national community of economic interests, even though the operation of some of their units is local. There are others which, notwithstanding their having national trade associations, do not actually integrate themselves nationally. Whether an industry can govern and police itself under the fair-trade provisions of a national code depends on its degree of actual economic integration on a national scale and on the organization and solidarity within the whole industry.

"A trial period of some months has shown that while most industries, after organization for this work and a little experience with it, can secure uniform national results, there are others to whom a greater degree of autonomous local self-government is desirable. Among these are some, but not all, of the so-called "service industries"—that is, industries engaged in the sale of services rather than of goods.

"No industry would give up the gains we have made in the elimination of child labor and in the establishment of minimum wages and maximum hours of labor and, of course, under the law, we cannot give up collective bargaining and the right of the President to cancel or modify codes, orders, and agreements.

I am signing an order today which carries these principles into effect as to some of the so-called "service industries."

To put it simply: No matter where he is located, no member of any such service industry, as shall have previously been designated by the Administrator, may fly the Blue Eagle unless he is living up to the present code provisions governing child labor, maximum hours, minimum wages, and collective bargaining.

But trade practices shall be required as a condition of flying the Blue Eagle in these designated service industries only in particular localities in which at least 85 percent of the members there have proposed as a local code of fair-trade practice a schedule of such practices in respect of which they all seek to agree with me to comply with their own proposal.

If the Administrator approves any such proposed local code, then no member in that locality may fly the Blue Eagle unless, in addition to complying with the code provisions governing child labor, maximum hours, maximum wages, and collective bargaining, he also is complying with this local compact on trade practices.

The display of the Blue Eagle by any employer is notice to the people of the United States that he is dealing fairly with his workers in accordance with the letter and spirit of the recovery program, that he is not taking advantage of child labor and that he is living up to the prescribed high responsibility to the public and to his competitors.

The absence of a Blue Eagle indicates that the employer has omitted or refused to adopt some of these standards and to cooperate with the Government and his economic and actual neighbors in trying to bring about a better day.

TEXT OF EXECUTIVE ORDER

The Executive order follows:

Pursuant to authority vested in me by title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, do hereby direct that all provisions in codes of such service trades or industries as shall hereafter be designated by the Administrator for National Recovery be hereby suspended until further orders, except provisions governing child labor, maximum hours of work and minimum rates of pay and the mandatory provisions of sections 7 (a) and 10 (b).

Each member of any such trade or industry, so designated, shall be entitled to display the appropriate insignia of the National Recovery Administration so long, and only so long, as he is complying with the aforesaid nonsuspended provisions; provided, however, that in any locality in which 85 percent of the members of any such designated trade or industry shall propose to agree with the President to abide by any local code of fair-trade practices suggested by them for that locality, which schedule shall have been approved by the Administrator, the Administrator is authorized to make such agreement and thereafter no member of such industry in such locality shall be entitled to display the appropriate insignia of the National Recovery Administration unless, in addition to the aforesaid nonsuspended provisions of the code, he is complying with all terms of such agreement.

The Administrator may supplement this order by such rules, regulations, exceptions, modifications, conditions, and determinations as, in his opinion, shall effectuate the purposes of this order and of said act.

RECEIVERS IN BANKRUPTCY

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I present a supplemental petition of the special committee of the New York County Lawyers Association in the matter of rules XIV, XXXIX, and XLVI of the General Orders in Bankruptcy and of bankruptcy rules XXVII, XXII, VIII, and XXX of the southern district of New York, relative to the matter of bankruptcy receiverships, together with an exhibit, being House Report No. 1104, Seventy-third Congress, second session, entitled "Receivers in Bankruptcy", which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

IN THE MATTER OF RULES XIV, XXXIX, AND XLVI OF THE GENERAL ORDERS IN BANKRUPTCY AND OF BANKRUPTCY RULES XXVII, XXII, VIII, AND XXX OF THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK. ON PETITION OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE NEW YORK COUNTY LAWYERS' ASSOCIATION

To the honorable the CHIEF JUSTICE AND ASSOCIATE JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES:

On May 24, 1933, the special committee of the New York County Lawyers' Association, appointed by resolution dated January 12, 1933, thereto annexed, filed a petition herein praying for a change in the present practice of appointing a sole standing receiver, as receiver in bankruptcy, and in a multiplicity of equity cases, for a change of rules and orders of this Court respecting the same, and for other relief as therein set forth. Since then many things have happened which further strengthen the said petition and show that equity and sound public policy dictate that there should be such change and that the petitioner is entitled to relief.

RESOLUTION OF THE BAR ASSOCIATIONS

The following bar associations, represented at a joint meeting held on January 22, 1934, in the building of the Downtown Athletic Club, in the city of New York, passed a resolution disapproving the selection of a standing receiver in the southern district of New York, the appointment of a trust company as a sole standing receiver, the solicitation of claims and powers of attorney by referees in bankruptcy for the election of the standing receiver as trustee in bankruptcy, to wit, New York County Lawyers Association, Federal Bar Association of the State of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, Bronx County Bar Association, Nassau County Bar Association, Brooklyn Bar Association, Queens County Bar Association, Yonkers Bar Association, Westchester County Bar Association, Richmond County Bar Association, Kings County Lawyers Association, Kings County Criminal Bar Association, Suffolk County Bar Association, Middletown Bar Association, Harlem Lawyers Association, and Women's Bronx County Bar Association.

The resolution is as follows:

"Be it resolved, That we, as representatives of the bar associations here assembled, unqualifiedly oppose the appointment by the United States District Court, Southern District of New York, of a corporate standing receiver or any standing receiver in bankruptcy, and the solicitation of powers of attorney by Federal referees for the election of the Irving Trust Co. as trustee, for the following reasons:

"First. That the court's appointment of such standing receiver creates a dangerous monopoly over all classes of business and is inimical to the best interests of the country and the administration of justice.

"Second. A standing receiver or trustee with unlimited discretion in the appointment of counsel and distribution of legal business, acquires and exercises insidious and sinister power to dominate the bar and distribute its legal business to small groups of its favorites, distribute patronage, as it were, and subvert freedom of the bar.

"Third. A free, independent, and untrammeled bar is just as essential to public welfare as a free press.

"Fourth. The investigation by a congressional committee of the Irving Trust Co. receiverships—even though limited, due to lack of funds—clearly establishes that the Irving Trust Co. was not more efficient than individual receivers, that certain charges made by the Irving Trust Co. for services as receiver or trustee were contrary to law, and that it greatly profited by the deposits of the funds of bankrupt estates with itself.

"And be it further

"Resolved, That we respectively urge the United States Supreme Court to act favorably on the petition of the New York County Lawyers Association to abolish the practice of appointing a standing receiver in bankruptcy, and of soliciting powers of attorney by the referees for the election of the Irving Trust Co. as trustee in bankruptcy."

In addition to the joint resolution of said 15 bar associations, attached to and made a part of this supplemental petition, and the resolution passed by the New York County Lawyers Association (under which our original petition was presented, and which was made a part thereof), we respectfully refer to the following certified copy of the resolution of the New York State Bar Association, which is as follows:

"At a meeting of the New York State Bar Association held in the rooms of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York on the 16th and 17th of January 1931, among other matters, the following resolution was passed:

"'Resolved, That the United States judges sitting in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York be respectfully requested to resume the practice of the appointing of individual receivers.'"

NEW YORK STATE BAR ASSOCIATION,
CHARLES W. WALTON, Secretary.

A true copy, March 21, 1934.

The Legislature of the State of New York at its present session of 1934, by a vote of 120 to 17 in the assembly and 43 to 3 in the senate, voted for laws intended to make impossible corporation receiverships.

In spite of the Governor's veto specifically stated by him as made not on the merits of the bill, but because he held it was a Federal question, the State senate thereafter, on April 18, 1934, resolved to amend the civil practice act to the same effect by a vote of 45 to 3.

The congressional Bankruptcy Investigating Committee, sitting in New York and hearing voluminous testimony, though representing in its personnel all sections and both major political parties, and after hearing counsel for the said trust company standing receiver, unanimously condemned its continuance as such corporation receiver, and monopoly.

CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION ON RECEIVERS IN BANKRUPTCY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

In the fall of 1933 the subcommittee of the congressional Committee on the Judiciary, conducted an investigation of the conditions relating to bankruptcy and equity receiverships and the selection of trustee, in the southern district of New York. Although hampered by limited funds to conduct a more thorough investigation, 1,364 pages of testimony were taken, in which are included numerous exhibits. Various witnesses, including the officials of the Irving Trust Co. and Hon. John C. Knox, senior United States district judge, testified. The committee made its report on the said investigation on March 29, 1934, to the House of Representatives, which is attached as exhibit A. We quote from same:

"The district judges of the southern district of New York some time ago adopted a rule setting up the Irving Trust Co., of the city of New York, as a standing receiver in all cases, and since that order, said Irving Trust Co. has supplanted the legal profession in the administration of receiverships in bankruptcy."

A few years ago there had occurred some scandals in the city of New York concerning the appointment of receivers. The United States judges of the southern district of New York, however, were not without blame, since they had in some cases themselves appointed incompetent and dishonest officials. Of course, it must be stated that considering the tremendous amount of work the judges must perform, to pass accurately in all cases upon the competency and honesty of their appointees is ofttimes difficult, if not impossible. Yet, as a result of the order of the judges, setting up the Irving Trust Co. as a standing receiver, there has been set up a monopoly in the Irving Trust Co. with power to appoint attorneys for the receiver, the appraisers, custodians, auctioneers, etc. Referees are also instructed by the judges in notices to creditors, in as persuasive and forceful language as possible, to suggest voting the Irving Trust Co. as trustee. This is contrary to the spirit of the Bankruptcy Act, which provides for creditor control over bankrupt estates. In almost every instance where the Irving Trust Co. has been appointed receiver it has been elected trustee.

Conflict of interest has often arisen. One bankruptcy estate often has claims against another estate. Since the Trust Co. is receiver or trustee in all cases, it has found itself making claims against itself. There are cases in the southern district of New York entitled "Irving Trust Co. as receiver against Irving Trust Co. as receiver."

In justification of their attitude, in setting up the bank as standing receiver, some of the judges had explained that formerly they were importuned at their homes, upon streets, and at public gatherings by those who sought to be appointed as receivers in bankruptcy cases. They claim they now have great peace of mind because they are no longer bothered with these insistent demands for appointments. It must be remembered, however, that the bankruptcy statute was not enacted for the convenience of judges or their peace of mind. Judges must be able to steel themselves against the improper importunities of friends. They must render themselves impervious to such demands and requests. If the judges complained of such political patronage in the appointment of receivers, it must be remembered that there has been set up another kind of patronage, namely, the Irving Trust Co. Doubtlessly, the one who confers the most favors and brings the most business to the Irving Trust Co. will in the long run receive lucrative appointments. The appointment of lawyers may not be exclusively upon merit or efficiency. Certainly, officials of the bank are just as human as the judges. They are subject to the same demands and importunities.

Furthermore, upon the suggestion of the judges of the southern district of New York, the Supreme Court adopted a rule permitting the Irving Trust Co. to deposit with itself bankrupt estate funds. This is most unusual. Nowhere else do we have a situation where a receiver or trustee can keep his or its own funds in his or its possession.

A subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee investigating conditions concerning the Irving Trust Co. brought out the fact that last summer there was $19,000,000 that the Irving Trust Co. held on deposit in the form of bankrupt estate funds.

Senior Circuit Judge Martin T. Manton, of the Circuit Court of Appeals embracing the southern district of New York, has this to say on the subject:

"All integrity, honesty, and understanding have not left the bar just because of the so-called 'bankruptcy scandal.' Lawyers give to bankruptcy cases their individual, personal attention—their humane consideration. They are efficient and competent, and I believe can handle the exigencies of bankruptcy situations more satisfactorily than a banking corporation."

The appointment of the Irving Trust Co. as a standing receiver was opposed by the New York State Bar Association, the Brooklyn Bar Association, the New York County Lawyers Bar Association, the Nassau County Bar Association, the Queens County Bar Association, the Richmond County Bar Association, the Bronx County Bar Association, and the Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. The Irving Trust Co. was receiver, for example, in the following cases: United Cigars, Lerner Dress, Owl Drug, Whelan Drug Stores, Wallack Bros. (haberdashery), Savoy Plaza Hotel, Hotel Pierre, McCory Stores, etc. It has under its control all manner and kinds of business and industries, retail, wholesale, manufacturing. It runs railroads, restaurants, trolley lines, hotels, and supervises the operation of 60 match corporations in Denmark, Finland, Guatemala, Yugoslavia, Norway, the Philippine Islands, Poland, Turkey, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, and Italy, and the United States. By the appointment of itself as ancillary receiver of many chain-store bankrupts, it functions in scores of congressional districts.

In the beginning, it set up its own collection agency, called the "Estate Collection Service", and in addition to its own fees as receiver, said Irving Trust Co. charged collecting fees. It took court proceedings to preclude the Irving Trust Co. from indulging in this practice.

The Irving Trust Co. issued a report to its stockholders January 17, 1934. It contains certain information as to the profitable operation of its bankruptcy-receivership department. There is a statement in the report to the effect that $100,000 a year is estimated as its profit as the trustee of bankruptcy funds. If such profit had been made by an individual trustee and not the Irving Trust Co., it would belong to the creditors who share in the dividends. This is not the case, however, with the Irving Trust Co.

The Irving Trust Co. and its defenders, including numerous trade associations, maintain that creditors have received more dividends and are far better off under the old system of appointing individual attorneys and entities as receivers. There is considerable dispute as to this.

The Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, however, says as follows:

"A careful examination and analysis of one of the reports filed by the Irving Trust Co. shows this bank to be of no practical advantage to the creditors over the administration by the creditors themselves under the bankruptcy law and no improvement for the public interest."

The representative of the Brooklyn Bar Association stated that his investigation demonstrated (1) that the Irving Trust Co. administration is not more economical, and (2) that the creditors are not receiving a larger percentage of the dividends by reason of the Irving Trust Co. acting as administrator.

The Irving Trust Co. has seen fit to appoint as its attorneys in various receiverships, a coterie of favorite attorneys. The fees received by these attorneys are staggering in amount. In the investigation conducted by the special committee of the Judiciary Committee at New York, it was disclosed that four law firms, out of 84 bankruptcy cases distributed among them, had received in fees a total, up to the time of the investigation in October 1933, of $1,043,584, and that there were numerous cases still pending in those offices for which no compensation had yet been paid. The stupendous fees paid to several of these law firms under the Irving Trust Co. arrangement is shocking. One firm, in particular, will have earned doubtlessly upward of three-quarters of a million dollars when the pending cases are concluded.

The continuing of the Irving Trust Co. as receiver will tend toward a monopoly that will give this corporation tyrannical control over the bar, because the amount of legal work it passes out is incalculable.

The New York State Legislature last year and the New York State Legislature recently passed what is known as the "McNaboe bill", which intended to prevent the Irving Trust Co. from exercising a virtual monopoly in receiverships. Although the measure did not mention that corporation by name, it provided that no corporation could act, directly or indirectly, as receiver or trustee in bankruptcy or as receiver in equity. The bill recently and the bill last year went through both houses of the legislature by wide margin. Governor Lehman last year and on March 24 of this year vetoed the bill, and said:

"The veto of this bill is not to be construed as an approval of the system existing in that district. The fact is, however, that the judges of the Federal court of the southern district, pursuant to the power vested in them, adopted the rule centering receiverships and trusteeships in bankruptcy in the hands of one corporation.

"If a change is desired, the judges of that court may make the change, or the change may be made by action of the Congress. It is not for this State to change by indirect means a rule made by a Federal court for the discharge of bankruptcy cases coming before it.

"As I said in my veto message of last year, interference by the State would not only be an unwarranted intrusion into what is primarily a judicial function, but it would carry that intrusion into Federal courts which are in no sense subject to State legislative control and into the field of bankruptcy which by the Constitution of the United States is vested in the Federal Government.

"We thus have an overwhelming expression of sentiment on the part of the New York State Legislature, representing the sentiment of the people of the State of New York, that it does not wish the continuance of the Irving Trust Co. as monopoly receiver in the Federal courts. The Governor of the State of New York says that it is not within the province of the State to act."

BANKRUPTCY AND EQUITY RECEIVERSHIP

Funds carried by bank at one-half percent interest since June 1931. Originally rate paid was 2 percent.

1930: February $653,146.49. From that amount the fund progressively rose to $8,378,293.97, during that year.

1931: January $10,740,410.55, and was in December $12,530,-616.69.

1932: January $11,940,693.72, and was in December $13,617,-862.95.

1933: January $17,866,416.46, February $20,930,159.52, March $21,130,815.95, April $21,758,509.49, May $21,758,509.49, June $22,158,273.23, July $22,410,260.34, August $21,107,658.80.

At the time of the investigation this fund was approximately $23,000,000.

Mr. Ward, the president of the Irving Trust Co., testified that before accepting the receivership he emphasized as a condition that the trust company should be given the right to carry all the funds on deposit with itself and that he considered that as an element of profit.

In a report issued by the Irving Trust Co. to stockholders in January 1934, it was stated that the trust company made an annual profit of $100,000 on those funds. Such profits should properly go to creditors and not to the bank.

The Irving Trust deposited with the court from time to time Liberty bonds paying 4½-percent interest to equal the funds on hand, that is of about $21,000,000. This would be tantamount to using the funds for the purchase of the Liberty bonds and drawing the interest at 4¼ percent which would go to the trust company.

The annual interest on $21,000,000 at 4 percent would amount to $840,000 net to the bank.

AS TO SOLICITATION OF CLAIMS AND POWERS OF ATTORNEY

In re Mayflower Hat Co., Inc. (65 Fed. (2d) 330) the Second Circuit Court of Appeals held that it is proper for laymen to solicit claims against a bankrupt, unless solicitation is done in the interest of bankrupt or to enable someone other than a general creditor to control trustee's election, and that an agent of bankrupt's creditor may obtain a power of attorney by solicitation and vote for himself as trustee.

Irresponsible collection agencies or trade associations may so solicit such claims. Referees in bankruptcy may solicit powers of attorney for the election of the Irving Trust Co. as trustee. But lawyers are prohibited from soliciting claims and powers of attorney, and may not be retained by the receiver or trustee, if they acted as attorneys for petitioning creditors.

The supplemental report of the Irving Trust Co. shows that during the whole period of their administration their payment of dividends were 0.71 of 1 percent less than bankruptcy proceedings administered by others in this district, and the payment of dividends would be still less, were it not for the fact that many of the old bankruptcy cases are being wound up.

A trust company of the dimensions of the Irving Trust Co. has great interests on its own account, many of which must necessarily be conflicting. Such a monopolistic fiduciary must frequently be required to serve two masters. In our original petition we illustrated how the bankrupt trusteeships of the standing receiver and trustee conflicted in specific cases. This is confirmed by the congressional report.

Rule XIV of the General Orders in Bankruptcy reads as follows:

"XIV. NO OFFICIAL OR GENERAL TRUSTEE

"No official trustee shall be appointed by the court nor any general trustee act in classes of cases."

If there should be no standing or official trustee, for the same reasons, there should be no standing or official receiver. In addition, the solicited powers of attorney by referees in practice makes official trustees.

"The judges of the southern district of New York in enacting a rule appointing the Irving Trust Co. as standing receiver went directly against the spirit of the bankruptcy rules of the Supreme Court as existing from the beginning of the law. It is the intent of that rule that there should be an absolute right in creditors to choose the trustee in each case; and it is contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of the Bankruptcy Act to have the Irving Trust Co. imposed upon the creditors as trustee in bankruptcy by the solicitation of the claims and powers of attorney by the referees to elect the Irving Trust Co. as such trustee. Whether directly or indirectly, the present practice in the southern district of New York in effect takes away the right of creditor control in the selection of a trustee."

A banking corporation, or trust company, as a part of the conscience of the Court is to us inconceivable.

The fact that a corporation, particularly a banking corporation, including the Irving Trust Co., is controlled by various stock interests, and stock ownership can shift and change from time to time, as the stock is publicly owned and bought and sold on the stock exchange (and the bank's officers and employees may be changed); and stock ownership is subject to transfer without the knowledge of anyone, including the judges, placing the domination of the officers of the corporation under such new ownership control, makes it improper that a corporation should be an officer of a court.

We submit to your honors that the local rules in bankruptcy for the southern district of New York, nos. 22 and 8 violate a fundamental canon of a judicial officer. The referee in bankruptcy is a judicial officer, and is the nisi prius court. He should be impartial. He should not be the proxy in an election upon the validity of which he himself, as such judicial officer, must pass judgment.

Reaffirming, therefore, our original petition and its recommendations, and continuing to voice our objection to any return to the old method of the frequent appointment of receivers from lists of names provided by political leaders, and to aid such creditor control, we suggest the following additional paragraph to the last part of our recommendation no. 14 (A of local rule 27 (see pp. 17 and 18 of original petition)) to wit—

"And for the purpose of aiding the court in estimating such majority of the creditors, the bankrupt shall, or any interested party may, file in court, within 2 days after the filing of a bankruptcy petition, or within such other period of time as the court may designate, a list of the names and addresses of all said bankrupt's creditors so far as the same are known to him. And the court may require such notice to them as it may deem reasonable by mail, telegram, or otherwise, unless such creditor has waived notice in writing."

We respectfully therefore request and pray this honorable court to amend its general orders in bankruptcy in accordance with our petitions.

And for such other and further relief as to this honorable court may seem just and proper.

Respectfully submitted.

EXHIBIT A

(H.Rept. No. 1104, 73d Cong., 2d sess.)

RECEIVERS IN BANKRUPTCY

MARCH 29, 1934.—REFERRED TO THE HOUSE CALENDAR AND ORDERED TO BE PRINTED

Mr. CELLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H.R. 8832):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H.R. 8832), to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, after consideration, report the same favorably to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

This bill provides that Federal courts shall make according to their discretion such an equitable distribution of appointments as receiver in bankruptcy as will prevent any persons, firms, or corporations from having a monopoly of such appointments in any district.

The district judges of the southern district of New York some time ago adopted a rule setting up the Irving Trust Co. of the city of New York as a standing receiver in all cases, and since that order, said Irving Trust Co. has supplanted the legal profession in the administration of receiverships in bankruptcy.

A few years ago there had occurred some scandals in the city of New York concerning the appointment of receivers. The United States judges of the southern district of New York, however, were not without blame, since they had in some cases themselves appointed incompetent and dishonest officials. Of course, it must be stated that considering the tremendous amount of work the judges must perform to pass accurately in all cases upon the competency and honesty of their appointees is ofttimes difficult, if not impossible. Yet, as a result of the order of the judges, setting up the Irving Trust Co. as a standing receiver, there has been set up a monopoly in the Irving Trust Co. with power to appoint attorneys for the receiver, the appraisers, custodians, auctioneers, etc. Referees are also instructed by the judges in notices to creditors, in as persuasive and forceful language as possible, to suggest voting the Irving Trust Co. as trustee. This is contrary to the spirit of the Bankruptcy Act, which provides for creditor control over bankrupt estates. In almost every instance where the Irving Trust Co. has been appointed receiver it has been elected trustee.

Conflict of interest has often arisen. One bankruptcy estate often has claims against another estate. Since the Trust Co. is receiver or trustee in all cases, it has found itself making claims against itself. There are cases in the southern district of New York entitled "Irving Trust Co. as receiver against Irving Trust Co. as receiver."

In justification of their attitude, in setting up the bank as standing receiver, some of the judges had explained that formerly they were importuned at their homes, upon the streets, and at public gatherings by those who sought to be appointed as receivers in bankruptcy cases. They claim they now have great peace of mind because they are no longer bothered with these insistent demands for appointments. It must be remembered, however, that the bankruptcy statute was not enacted for the convenience of judges or their peace of mind. Judges must be able to steel themselves against the improper importunities of friends. They must render themselves impervious to such demands and requests. If the judges complained of such political patronage in the appointment of receivers, it must be remembered that there has been set up another kind of patronage, namely, the Irving Trust Co. Doubtlessly the one who confers the most favors and brings the most business to the Irving Trust Co. will in the long run receive lucrative appointments. The appointment of lawyers may not be exclusively upon merit or efficiency. Certainly officials of the bank are just as human as the judges. They are subject to the same demands and importunities.

Furthermore, upon the suggestion of the judges of the southern district of New York, the Supreme Court adopted a rule permitting the Irving Trust Co. to deposit with itself bankrupt estate funds. This is most unusual. Nowhere else do we have a situation where a receiver or trustee can keep his or its own funds in his or its possession.

A subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee investigating conditions concerning the Irving Trust Co. brought out the fact that last summer there was $19,000,000 that the Irving Trust Co. held on deposit in the form of bankrupt estate funds.

Senior Circuit Judge Martin T. Manton, of the circuit court of appeals, embracing the southern district of New York, has this to say on the subject:

"All integrity, honesty, and understanding have not left the bar just because of the so-called 'bankruptcy scandal.' Lawyers give to bankruptcy cases their individual, personal attention—their humane consideration. They are efficient and competent, and I believe can handle the exigencies of bankruptcy situations more satisfactorily than a banking corporation."

The appointment of the Irving Trust Co. as a standing receiver was opposed by the New York State Bar Association, the Brooklyn Bar Association, the New York County Lawyers Bar Association, the Nassau County Bar Association, the Queens County Bar Association, the Richmond County Bar Association, the Bronx County Bar Association, and the Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. The Irving Trust Co. was receiver, for example, in the following cases: United Cigars, Lerner Dress, Owl Drug, Whelan Drug Stores, Wallack Bros. (haberdashery), Savoy Plaza Hotel, Hotel Pierre, McCrory Stores, etc. It has under its control all manner and kinds of business and industries, retail, wholesale, manufacturing. It runs railroads, restaurants, trolley lines, hotels, and supervises the operation of 60 match corporations in Denmark, Finland, Guatemala, Yugoslavia, Norway, the Philippine Islands, Poland, Turkey, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, and Italy, and the United States. By the appointment of itself as ancillary receiver of many chain-store bankrupts, it functions in scores of congressional districts.

In the beginning, it set up its own collection agency, called the Estates Collection Service, and in addition to its own fees as receiver, said Irving Trust Co. charged collecting fees. It took court proceedings to preclude the Irving Trust Co. from indulging in this practice.

The Irving Trust Co. issued a report to its stockholders January 17, 1934. It contains certain information as to the profitable operation of its bankruptcy-receivership department. There is a statement in the report to the effect that $100,000 a year is estimated as its profit as the trustee of bankruptcy funds. If such profit had been made by an individual trustee and not the Irving Trust Co., it would belong to the creditors who share in the dividends. This is not the case, however, with the Irving Trust Co.

The Irving Trust Co. and its defenders, including numerous trade associations, maintain that creditors have received more dividends and are far better off under the old system of appointing individual attorneys and entities as receivers. There is considerable dispute as to this.

The Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, however, says as follows:

"A careful examination and analysis of one of the reports filed by the Irving Trust Co. shows this bank to be of no practical advantage to the creditors over the administration by the creditors themselves under the bankruptcy law and no improvement for the public interest."

The representative of the Brooklyn Bar Association stated that his investigation demonstrated (1) that the Irving Trust Co. administration is not more economical, and (2) that the creditors are not receiving a larger percentage of the dividends by reason of the Irving Trust Co. acting as administrator.

The Irving Trust Co. has seen fit to appoint as its attorneys in various receiverships, a coterie of favorite attorneys. The fees received by these attorneys are staggering in amount. In the investigation conducted by the special committee of the Judiciary Committee at New York, it was disclosed that 4 law firms out of 84 bankruptcy cases distributed among them, had received in fees a total, up to the time of the investigation in October 1933, of $1,043,584, and that there were numerous cases still pending in those offices for which no compensation had yet been paid. The stupendous fees paid to several of these law firms under the Irving Trust Co. arrangement is shocking. One firm in particular will have earned doubtlessly upward of three-quarters of a million dollars when the pending cases are concluded.

The continuing of the Irving Trust Co. as receiver will tend toward a monopoly that will give this corporation tyrannical control over the bar, because the amount of legal work it passes out is incalculable.

The New York State Legislature last year and the New York State Legislature recently passed what is known as the "McNaboe bill", which intended to prevent the Irving Trust Co. from exercising a virtual monopoly in receiverships. Although the measure did not mention that corporation by name, it provided that no corporation could act, directly or indirectly, as receiver or trustee in bankruptcy or as receiver in equity. The bill recently and the bill last year went through both houses of the legislature by wide margins. Governor Lehman last year and on March 24 of this year vetoed the bill, and said:

"The veto of this bill is not to be construed as an approval of the system existing in that district. The fact is, however, that the judges of the Federal court of the southern district, pursuant to the power vested in them, adopted the rule centering receiverships and trusteeships in bankruptcy in the hands of one corporation.

"If a change is desired, the judges of that court may make the change, or the change may be made by action of the Congress. It is not for this State to change by indirect means a rule made by a Federal court for the discharge of bankruptcy cases coming before it.

"As I said in my veto message of last year, interference by the State would not only be an unwarranted intrusion into what is primarily a judicial function but it would carry that intrusion into Federal courts which are in no sense subject to State legislative control and into the field of bankruptcy, which by the Constitution of the United States is vested in the Federal Government.

"We thus have an overwhelming expression of sentiment on the part of the New York State Legislature, representing the sentiment of the people of the State of New York, that it does not wish the continuance of the Irving Trust Co. as monopoly receiver in the Federal courts. The Governor of the State of New York says that it is not within the province of the State to act. It is the duty of Congress to act."

In compliance with clause 2a of rule XIII, there follows in roman section 74 of the Bankruptcy Act, with the new matter added by H.R. 8832 in italics:

"SEC. 74. Compositions and extensions: (a) Any person excepting a corporation may file a petition, or, in an involuntary proceeding before adjudication, an answer within the time limited by section 18 (b) of this act, accompanied in either case, unless further time is granted, by his schedules, stating that he is insolvent or unable to meet his debts as they mature, and that he desires to effect a composition or an extension of time to pay his debts. The term 'debt' for the purposes of an extension proposal under this section shall include all claims of whatever character against the debtor or his property, including a claim for future rent, whether or not such claims would otherwise constitute provable claims under this act. Upon the filing of such a petition or answer the judge shall enter an order either approving it as properly filed under this section, if satisfied that such petition or answer complies with this section and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it. If such petition or answer is approved, an order of adjudication shall not be entered except as provided in subdivision (1) of this section: Provided, however, That in staying the action for adjudication in an involuntary proceeding the court shall make such stay conditional upon such terms for the protection and indemnity against loss by the estate as may be proper, and that in any other proceeding under this section the court may, as the creditors at the first meeting may direct, impose similar terms as a condition of delaying the appointment of a trustee and the liquidation of the estate. Any person by or against whom a petition is filed shall be referred to in the proceedings under this section as 'debtor.' The term 'creditor' shall include for the purposes of an extension proposal under this section all holders of claims of whatever character against the debtor or his property, including a claim for future rent, whether or not such claims would otherwise constitute provable claims under this act. A claim for future rent shall constitute a provable debt and shall be liquidated under section 63 (b) of this act.

"(b) After the filing of such petition or answer, the court may upon reasonable notice to creditors and attorneys of record appoint a custodian or receiver, who shall inventory the debtor's estate and exercise such supervision and control over the conduct of the debtor's business as the creditors at any meeting or the court shall direct.

"(c) The custodian or receiver, or if none has been appointed, the court shall promptly call the first meeting of creditors, stating in the notice that the debtor proposes to offer terms of composition or extension, and enclosing with the notice a summary of the inventory, a brief statement of the debtor's indebtedness as shown by the schedules, and a list of the names and addresses of the secured creditors and the 15 largest unsecured creditors, with the amounts owing to each as shown by the schedules. Any creditor may appear at or before the first meeting and controvert the facts alleged in the petition. In such case the court shall determine as soon as may be the issues presented, without the intervention of a jury, and unless the material allegations are sustained by the proofs shall dismiss the petition.

"(d) At the first meeting (1) the debtor may be examined; (2) the creditors may nominate a trustee, who shall thereafter be appointed by the court in case it becomes necessary to liquidate the estate as provided in subdivision (1) of this section; and (3) the court shall, after hearing the parties in interest, fix a reasonable time within which application for confirmation shall be made. The court may later extend such time for cause shown, and may require, as a condition of such extension, additional terms for the protection of and indemnity against loss by the estate as may be proper.

"(e) An application for the confirmation of a composition or extension proposal may be filed in the court of bankruptcy after, but not before, it has been accepted in writing by a majority in number of all creditors whose claims if unsecured have been allowed, or if secured are proposed to be affected by an extension proposal, which number must represent a majority in amount of such claims; and the money or security necessary to pay all debts which have priority unless waived and the costs of the proceedings, and in case of a composition the consideration to be paid by the debtor to his creditors, have been deposited in such place as shall be designated by and subject to the order of the court.

"(f) A date and place, with reference to the convenience of the parties in interest, shall be fixed for a hearing upon each application for the confirmation of the composition or extension proposal, and such objections as may be made to its confirmation.

"(g) The court shall confirm the proposal, if satisfied that (1) it includes an equitable and feasible method of liquidation for secured creditors whose claims are affected and of financial rehabilitation for the debtor; (2) it is for the best interests of all creditors; (3) that the debtor has not been guilty of any of the acts, or failed to perform any of the duties, which would be a ground for denying his discharge; and (4) the offer and its acceptance are in good faith, and have not been made or procured except as herein provided, or by any means, promises, or acts herein forbidden. In application for extensions, the court shall require proof from each creditor filing a claim that such claim is free from usury as defined by the laws of the place where the debt is contracted.

"(h) The terms of an extension proposal may extend the time of payment of either or both unsecured debts and secured debts the security for which is in the actual or constructive possession of the debtor or of the custodian or receiver, and may provide for priority of payments to be made during the period of extension as between secured and unsecured creditors. It may also include specific undertakings by the debtor during the period of the extension, including provisions for payments on account, and may provide for supervisory or other control over the debtor's business or affairs during such period by a creditors' committee or otherwise, and for the termination of such period under certain specified conditions: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not affect the allowances and exemptions to debtors as are provided for bankrupts under title 11, chapter 3, section 24, of the United States Code, and such allowances and exemptions shall be set aside for the use of the debtor in the manner provided for bankrupts.

"(i). Upon its confirmation an extension proposal shall be binding upon the debtor and his unsecured and secured creditors affected thereby: Provided, however, That such extension or composition shall not reduce the amount of or impair the lien of any secured creditor, but shall affect only the time and method of its liquidation.

"(j) Upon the confirmation of a composition the consideration shall be distributed as the court shall direct, and the case dismissed: Provided, That the debts having priority of payment under title 11, chapter 7, section 104, of the United States Code, for bankrupt estates, shall have priority of payment in the same order as set forth in said section 104 under the provisions of this section in any distribution, assignment, composition, or settlement herein provided for. Upon the confirmation of an extension proposal the court may dismiss the proceeding or retain jurisdiction of the debtor and his property during the period of the extension in order to protect and preserve the estate and enforce the terms of the extension proposal.

"(k) The judge may, upon the application of the parties in interest, filed at any time within 6 months after the composition or extension proposal has been confirmed, set the same aside and reinstate the case, if it shall be made to appear upon a trial that fraud was practiced in the procuring of such composition or extension, and that knowledge thereof has come to the petitioners since the confirmation thereof.

"(l) If (1) the debtor shall fail to comply with any of the terms required of him for the protection of and indemnity against loss by the estate; or (2) the debtor has failed to make the required deposit in case of a composition; or (3) the debtor's proposal has not been accepted by the creditors; or (4) confirmation has been denied; or (5) without sufficient reason the debtor defaults in any payment required to be made under the terms of an extension proposal when the court has retained jurisdiction of the debtor or his property, the court may appoint the trustee nominated by the creditors at the first meeting, and if the creditors shall have failed to so nominate, may appoint any other qualified person as trustee to liquidate the estate. The court shall in addition adjudge the debtor a bankrupt if satisfied that he commenced or prolonged the proceeding for the purpose of delaying creditors and avoiding an adjudication in bankruptcy, or if the confirmation of his proposal has been denied. No order of liquidation or adjudication shall be entered in any proceeding under this section instituted by or against a wage earner or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil unless the wage earner or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil consents.

"(m) The filing of a debtor's petition or answer seeking relief under this section shall subject the debtor and his property, wherever located, to the exclusive jurisdiction of the court in which the order approving the petition or answer as provided in subdivision (a) is filed. In proceedings under this section, except as otherwise provided therein, the jurisdiction and powers of the court, the title, powers, and duties of its officers and, subject to the approval of the court, their fees, the duties of the debtor, and the rights and liabilities of creditors, and of all persons with respect to the property of the debtor, and the jurisdiction of appellate courts shall be the same as if a voluntary petition for adjudication had been filed and a decree of adjudication had been entered on the day when the debtor's petition or answer was filed and any decree of adjudication thereafter entered shall have the same effect as if it had been entered on that day.

"(n) In addition to the provisions of section 11 of this act for the staying of pending suits, the court, on such notice and on such terms, if any, as it deems fair and equitable, may enjoin secured creditors who may be affected by the extension proposal from proceeding in any court for the enforcement of their claims until the extension has been confirmed or denied by the court.

"(o) The judges of the courts of bankruptcy shall appoint sufficient referees to sit in convenient places to expedite the proceedings under this section.

"(p) Involuntary proceedings under this section shall not be taken against a wage earner.

"(q) In the administration of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, as amended, the district court or any judge thereof shall make in its or his discretion such an equitable distribution of appointments as receiver as will prevent any persons, firms, or corporations from having a monopoly of such appointments within such district."

EXECUTIVE SESSION

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT CONVENTION

On motion of Mr. DUFFY, the injunction of secrecy was removed from Executive E, Seventy-third Congress, second session, being the International Convention of the Copyright Union as revised and signed at Rome on June 2, 1928.

The convention was made public, as follows:

[Senate, Executive E, 73d Cong., 2d sess.]

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT CONVENTION

ARTICLE 1

The Countries to which the present Convention applies shall be constituted into a Union for the protection of the rights of authors in their literary and artistic works.

ARTICLE 2

(1) The term "literary and artistic works" shall include all productions in the literary, scientific, and artistic domain, whatever the mode or form of expression, such as: books, pamphlets, and other writings; lectures, addresses, sermons and other works of like nature; dramatic or dramatico-musical works; choreographic works and pantomimes, the staging (mise en scène) of which is fixed in writing or otherwise; musical compositions with or without words; drawings, paintings; works of architecture and sculpture; engravings and lithographs; illustrations; geographical charts; plans, sketches, and plastic works relating to geography, topography, architecture, or the sciences.

(2) Translations, adaptations, arrangements of music and other reproductions transformed from a literary or artistic work, as well as compilations from different works, shall be protected as original works without prejudice to the rights of the author of the original work.

(3) The countries of the Union shall be bound to secure protection in the case of the works mentioned above.

(4) Works of art applied to industry shall be protected so far as the domestic legislation of each country allows.

ARTICLE 2 BIS

(1) The authority is reserved to the domestic legislation of each country of the Union to exclude, partially or wholly, from the protection provided by the preceding Article political discourses or discourses pronounced in judicial debates.

(2) There is also reserved to the domestic legislation of each country of the Union authority to enact the conditions under which such lectures, addresses, sermons and other works of like nature may be reproduced by the press. Nevertheless, the author alone shall have the right to bring such works together in a compilation.

ARTICLE 3

The present convention shall apply to photographic works and to works obtained by any process analogous to photography. The countries of the Union shall be bound to guarantee protection to such works.

ARTICLE 4

(1) Authors within the jurisdiction of one of the countries of the Union shall enjoy for their works, whether unpublished or published for the first time in one of the countries of the Union, such rights, in the countries other than the country of origin of the work, as the respective laws now accord or shall hereafter accord to nationals, as well as the rights specially accorded by the present Convention.

(2) The enjoyment and the exercise of such rights shall not be subject to any formality; such enjoyment and such exercise are independent of the existence of protection in the country of origin of the work. Consequently, apart from the stipulations of the present Convention, the extent of the protection, as well as the means of redress guaranteed to the author to safeguard his rights, shall be regulated exclusively according to the legislation of the country where the protection is claimed.

(3) The following shall be considered as the country of origin of the work: for unpublished works, the country to which the author belongs; for published works, the country of first publication, and for works published simultaneously in several countries of the Union, the country among them whose legislation grants the shortest term of protection. For works published simultaneously in a country outside of the Union and in a country within the Union, it is the latter country which shall be exclusively considered as the country of origin.

(4) By "published works" (oeuvres publiées) must be understood, according to the present Convention, works which have been issued (oeuvres éditées). The representation of a dramatic or dramatico-musical work, the performance of a musical work, the exhibition of a work of art and the construction of a work of architecture shall not constitute publication.

ARTICLE 5

Authors within the jurisdiction of one of the countries of the Union who publish their works for the first time in another country of the Union, shall have in this latter country the same rights as national authors.

ARTICLE 6

(1) Authors not within the jurisdiction of any one of the countries of the Union, who publish their works for the first time in one of the Union countries, shall enjoy in such Union country the same rights as national authors, and in the other countries of the Union the rights accorded by the present Convention.

(2) Nevertheless, when a country outside of the Union does not protect in an adequate manner the works of authors within the jurisdiction of one of the countries of the Union, this latter Union country may restrict the protection for the works of authors who are, at the time of the first publication of such works, within the jurisdiction of the non-Union country and are not actually domiciled in one of the countries of the Union.

(3) Any restriction, established by virtue of the preceding paragraph, shall not prejudice the rights which an author may have acquired in a work published in one of the countries of the Union before the putting into effect of this restriction.

(4) The countries of the Union which, by virtue of the present article, restrict the protection of the rights of authors, shall notify the fact to the Government of the Swiss Confederation by a written declaration indicating the countries in whose case protection is restricted, and indicating also the restrictions to which the rights of authors within the jurisdiction of such country are subjected. The Government of the Swiss Confederation shall immediately communicate this fact to all the countries of the Union.

ARTICLE 6 BIS

(1) Independently of the author's copyright, and even after assignment of the said copyright, the author shall retain the right to claim authorship of the work, as well as the right to object to every deformation, mutilation or other modification of the said work, which may be prejudicial to his honor or to his reputation.

(2) It is left to the national legislation of each of the countries of the Union to establish the conditions for the exercise of these rights. The means for safeguarding them shall be regulated by the legislation of the country where protection is claimed.

ARTICLE 7

(1) The duration of the protection granted by the present Convention shall comprise the life of the author and fifty years after his death.

(2) In case this period of protection, however, should not be adopted uniformly by all the countries of the Union, its duration shall be regulated by the law of the country where protection is claimed, and it can not exceed the term fixed in the country of origin of the work. The countries of the Union will consequently not be required to apply the provision of the preceding paragraph beyond the extent to which it agrees with their domestic law.

(3) For photographic works and works obtained by a process analogous to photography; for posthumous works; for anonymous or pseudonymous works, the term of protection shall be regulated by the law of the country where protection is claimed, but this term shall not exceed the term fixed in the country of origin of the work.

ARTICLE 7 BIS

(1) The term of copyright protection belonging in common to collaborators in a work shall be calculated according to the date of the death of the last survivor of the collaborators.

(2) Persons within the jurisdiction of countries which grant a shorter period of protection than that provided in paragraph 1 can not claim in the other countries of the Union a protection of longer duration.

(3) In any case the term of protection shall not expire before the death of the last survivor of the collaborators.

ARTICLE 8

Authors of unpublished works within the jurisdiction of one of the countries of the Union, and authors of works published for the first time in one of these countries, shall enjoy in the other countries of the Union during the whole term of the right in the original work the exclusive right to make or to authorize the translation of their works.

ARTICLE 9

(1) Serial stories, tales and all other works, whether literary, scientific, or artistic, whatever may be their subject, published in newspapers or periodicals of one of the countries of the Union, may not be reproduced in the other countries without the consent of the authors.

(2) Articles of current economic, political, or religious discussion may be reproduced by the press if their reproduction is not expressly reserved. But the source must always be clearly indicated; the sanction of this obligation shall be determined by the legislation of the country where the protection is claimed.

(3) The protection of the present Convention shall not apply to news of the day or to miscellaneous news having the character merely of press information.

ARTICLE 10

As concerns the right of borrowing lawfully from literary or artistic works for use in publications intended for instruction or having a scientific character, or for chrestomathies, the provisions of the legislation of the countries of the Union and of the special treaties existing or to be concluded between them shall govern.

ARTICLE 11

(1) The stipulations of the present Convention shall apply to the public representation of dramatic or dramatico-musical works and to the public performance of musical works, whether these works are published or not.

(2) Authors of dramatic or dramatico-musical works shall be protected, during the term of their copyright in the original work, against the unauthorized public representation of a translation of their works.

(3) In order to enjoy the protection of this article, authors in publishing their works shall not be obliged to prohibit the public representation or public performance of them.

ARTICLE 11 BIS

(1) The authors of literary and artistic works shall enjoy the exclusive right to authorize the communication of their works to the public by broadcasting.

(2) It belongs to the national legislatures of the countries of the Union to regulate the conditions for the exercise of the right declared in the preceding paragraph, but such conditions shall have an effect strictly limited to the country which establishes them. They can not in any case adversely affect the moral right of the author, nor the right which belongs to the author of obtaining an equitable remuneration fixed, in default of an amicable agreement, by competent authority.

ARTICLE 12

Among the unlawful reproductions to which the present Convention applies shall be specially included indirect, unauthorized appropriations of a literary or artistic work, such as adaptations, arrangements of music, transformations of a romance or novel or of a poem into a theatrical piece and vice-versa, etc., when they are only the reproduction of such work in the same form or in another form with non-essential changes, additions or abridgements and without presenting the character of a new, original work.

ARTICLE 13

(1) Authors of musical works shall have the exclusive right to authorize: (1) the adaptation of these works to instruments serving to reproduce them mechanically; (2) the public performance of the same works by means of these instruments.

(2) The limitations and conditions relative to the application of this article shall be determined by the domestic legislation of each country in its own case; but all limitations and conditions of this nature shall have an effect strictly limited to the country which shall have adopted them.

(3) The provisions of paragraph 1 shall have no retroactive effect, and therefore shall not be applicable in a country of the Union to works which, in that country, shall have been lawfully adapted to mechanical instruments before the going into force of the Convention signed at Berlin, November 13, 1908; and, in the case of a country which has acceded to the Union since that date, or shall accede to it in the future, then when the works have been adapted to mechanical instruments before the date of its accession.

(4) Adaptations made by virtue of paragraphs 2 and 3 of this article and imported, without the authorization of the parties interested, into a country where they would not be lawful, shall be liable to seizure there.

ARTICLE 14

(1) Authors of literary, scientific or artistic works shall have the exclusive right to authorize the reproduction, adaptation, and public representation of their works by means of the cinematograph.

(2) Cinematographic productions shall be protected as literary or artistic works when the author shall have given to the work an original character. If this character is lacking, the cinematographic production shall enjoy the same protection as photographic works.

(3) Without prejudice to the rights of the author of the work reproduced or adapted, the cinematographic work shall be protected as an original work.

(4) The preceding provisions apply to the reproduction or production obtained by any other process analogous to cinematography.

ARTICLE 15

(1) In order that the authors of the works protected by the present Convention may be considered as such, until proof to the contrary, and be admitted consequently before the courts of the various countries of the Union to proceed against infringers, it shall suffice that the author's name be indicated upon the work in the usual manner.

(2) For anonymous or pseudonymous works, the publisher whose name is indicated upon the work shall be entitled to protect the rights of the author. He shall, without other proof, be considered the legal representative of the anonymous or pseudonymous author.

ARTICLE 16

(1) All infringing works may be seized by the competent authorities of the countries of the Union where the original work has a right to legal protection.

(2) Seizure may also be made in these countries of reproductions which come from a country where the copyright on the work has terminated, or where the work has not been protected.

(3) The seizure shall take place in conformity with the domestic legislation of each country.

ARTICLE 17

The provisions of the present Convention may not prejudice in any way the right which belongs to the Government of each of the countries of the Union to permit, to supervise, or to forbid, by means of legislation or of domestic police, the circulation, the representation or the exhibition of every work or production in regard to which competent authority may have to exercise this right.

ARTICLE 18

(1) The present Convention shall apply to all works which, at the time it goes into effect, have not fallen into the public domain of their country of origin because of the expiration of the term of protection.

(2) But if a work by reason of the expiration of the term of protection which was previously secured for it has fallen into the public domain of the country where protection is claimed, such work shall not be protected anew.

(3) This principle shall be applied in accordance with the stipulations to that effect contained in the special Conventions either existing or to be concluded between countries of the Union, and in default of such stipulations, its application shall be regulated by each country in its own case.

(4) The preceding provisions shall apply equally in the case of new accessions to the Union and where the protection would be extended by the application of Article 7 or by the abandonment of reservations.

ARTICLE 19

The provisions of the present Convention shall not prevent a claim for the application of more favorable provisions which may be enacted by the legislation of a country of the Union in favor of foreigners in general.

ARTICLE 20

The governments of the countries of the Union reserve the right to make between themselves special treaties, when these treaties would confer upon authors more extended rights than those accorded by the Union, or when they contain other stipulations not conflicting with the present Convention. The provisions of existing treaties which answer the aforesaid conditions shall remain in force.

ARTICLE 21

(1) The international office instituted under the name of "Bureau of the International Union for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works" ("Bureau de l'Union internationale pour la protection des oeuvres littéraires et artistiques") shall be maintained.

(2) This Bureau is placed under the high authority of the Government of the Swiss Confederation, which controls its organization and supervises its working.

(3) The official language of the Bureau shall be French.

ARTICLE 22

(1) The International Bureau shall bring together, arrange and publish information of every kind relating to the protection of the rights of authors in their literary and artistic works. It shall study questions of mutual utility interesting to the Union, and edit, with the aid of documents placed at its disposal by the various administrations, a periodical in the French language, treating questions concerning the purpose of the Union. The governments of the countries of the Union reserve the right to authorize the Bureau by common accord to publish an edition in one or more other languages, in case experience demonstrates the need.

(2) The International Bureau must hold itself at all times at the disposal of members of the Union to furnish them, in relation to questions concerning the protection of literary and artistic works, the special information of which they have need.

(3) The Director of the International Bureau shall make an annual report on his administration, which shall be communicated to all the members of the Union.

ARTICLE 23

(1) The expenses of the Bureau of the International Union shall be shared in common by the countries of the Union. Until a new decision, they may not exceed one hundred and twenty thousand Swiss francs per year. This sum may be increased when needful by the unanimous decision of one of the Conferences provided for in Article 24.

(2) To determine the part of this sum total of expenses to be paid by each of the countries, the countries of the Union and those which later adhere to the Union shall be divided into six classes each contributing in proportion to a certain number of units to wit:

	Units
1st class	25
2nd class	20
3rd class	15
4th class	10
5th class	5
6th class	3

(3) These coefficients are multiplied by the number of countries of each class, and the sum of the products thus obtained furnishes the number of units by which the total expense is to be divided. The quotient gives the amount of the unit of expense.

(4) Each country shall declare, at the time of its accession, in which of the above-mentioned classes it demands to be placed, but it may always ultimately declare that it intends to be placed in another class.

(5) The Swiss Administration shall prepare the budget of the Bureau and superintend its expenditures, make necessary advances and draw up the annual account, which shall be communicated to all the other administrations.

ARTICLE 24

(1) The present Convention may be subjected to revision with a view to the introduction of amendments calculated to perfect the system of the Union.

(2) Questions of this nature, as well as those which from other points of view pertain to the development of the Union, shall be considered in the Conferences which will take place successively in the countries of the Union between the delegates of the said countries. The administration of the country where a Conference is to be held shall, with the cooperation of the International Bureau, prepare the agenda of the same. The Director of the Bureau shall attend the meetings of the Conferences and take part in the discussions without a deliberative voice.

(3) No change in the present Convention shall be valid for the Union except by the unanimous consent of the countries which compose it.

ARTICLE 25

(1) The countries outside of the Union which assure legal protection of the rights which are the object of the present Convention, may accede to it upon their request.

(2) Such accession shall be communicated in writing to the Government of the Swiss Confederation and by the latter to all the others.

3. The full right of adhesion to all the clauses and admission to all the advantages stipulated in the present Convention shall be implied by such accession and it shall go into effect one month after the sending of the notification by the Government of the Swiss Confederation to the other countries of the Union, unless a later date has been indicated by the adhering country. Nevertheless, such accession may contain an indication that the adhering country intends to substitute, provisionally at least, for Article 8 concerning translations, the provisions of Article 5 of the Convention of the Union of 1886, revised at Paris in 1896, it being of course understood that these provisions relate only to translations into the language or languages of the country.

ARTICLE 26

(1) Each of the countries of the Union may, at any time, notify in writing the Government of the Swiss Confederation that the present Convention shall be applicable to all or to part of its colonies, protectorates, territories under mandate or all other territories subject to its sovereignty or to its authority, or all territories under suzerainty, and the Convention shall then apply to all the territories designated in the notification. In default of such notification, the Convention shall not apply to such territories.

(2) Each of the countries of the Union may, at any time, notify in writing the Government of the Swiss Confederation that the present Convention shall cease to be applicable to all or to part of the territories which were the object of the notification provided for by the preceding paragraph, and the Convention shall cease to apply in the territories designated in such notification twelve months after receipt of the notification addressed to the Government of the Swiss Confederation

(3) All the notifications made to the Government of the Swiss Confederation, under the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 2 of this article, shall be communicated by that Government to all the countries of the Union

ARTICLE 27

(1) The present Convention shall replace in the relations between the countries of the Union the Convention of Berne of September 9, 1886 and the acts by which it has been successively revised. The acts previously in effect shall remain applicable in the relations with the countries which shall not have ratified the present Convention.

(2) The countries in whose name the present Convention is signed may still retain the benefit of the reservations which they have previously formulated on condition that they make such a declaration at the time of the deposit of the ratifications.

(3) Countries which are at present parties to the Union, but in whose name the present Convention has not been signed, may at any time adhere to it. They may in such case benefit by the provisions of the preceding paragraph.

ARTICLE 28

(1) The present Convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be deposited at Rome not later than July 1, 1931.

(2) It shall go into effect between the countries of the Union which have ratified it one month after that date. However, if, before that date, it has been ratified by at least six countries of the Union it shall go into effect as between those countries of the Union one month after the deposit of the sixth ratification has been notified to them by the Government of the Swiss Confederation and, for the countries of the Union which shall later ratify, one month after the notification of each such ratification.

(3) Countries that are not within the Union may, until August 1, 1931, enter the Union, by means of adhesion, either to the Convention signed at Berlin November 13, 1908, or to the present Convention. After August 1, 1931, they can adhere only to the present Convention.

ARTICLE 29

(1) The present Convention shall remain in effect for an indeterminate time, until the expiration of one year from the day when denunciation of it shall have been made.

(2) This denunciation shall be addressed to the Government of the Swiss Confederation. It shall be effective only as regards the country which shall have made it, the Convention remaining in force for the other countries of the Union.

ARTICLE 30

(1) The countries which introduce into their legislation the term of protection of fifty years provided for by Article 7, paragraph 1, of the present Convention, shall make it known to the Government of the Swiss Confederation by a written notification which shall be communicated at once by that Government to all the other countries of the Union.

(2) It shall be the same for such countries as shall renounce any reservations made or maintained by them by virtue of Articles 25 and 27.

In faith whereof, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Convention.

Done at Rome, the second of June, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight, in a single copy, which shall be deposited in the archives of the Royal Italian Government. One copy, properly certified, shall be sent through diplomatic channels to each of the countries of the Union.

FRANK S. BERGIN

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take action at this time on the unfavorable report from the Judiciary Committee of the nomination of Frank S. Bergin to be United States attorney, District of Connecticut, and I hope the Senate will vote to reject the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BONE in the chair). The clerk will state the nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Frank S. Bergin of Connecticut to be United States attorney, District of Connecticut, reported adversely from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Connecticut if the report of the committee was unanimous?

Mr. LONERGAN. It is a unanimous report of all members of the committee present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the nomination? The Chair hears none. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

The nomination was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar is in order.

NOMINATION OF JOHN WARD STUDEBAKER—RECOMMITTED

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John Ward Studebaker, of Iowa, to be Commissioner of Education.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nomination be recommitted to the Committee on Education and Labor for further consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 27 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, May 29, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m.

REJECTION

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate May 28, 1934

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

Frank S. Bergin to be United States attorney, district of Connecticut.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MAY 28, 1934

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

God, be merciful unto us and bless us; and cause His face to shine upon us; that Thy way be known upon the earth, Thy saving health among all nations. Let the people praise Thee, O God; let all the people praise Thee. O let the nations be glad and sing for joy, for Thou shalt judge the people righteously and govern the nations upon earth. Let the people praise Thee, O God; let all the people praise Thee. Then shall the earth yield her increase, and God, even our God, shall bless us. God shall bless us and all the ends of the earth shall fear Him. We pray in the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, May 24, 1934, was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, since I became a Member a little over a year ago, I have voted "no" on more than $6,000,000,000 of expenditures that got by the House. While I was Governor I watched appropriations so closely that I became known throughout the State as a "tightwad." I mention these facts, not to invite either praise or blame, but to indicate that when I favor increased spending for any purpose it is only because I am convinced that increased spending for that purpose is true economy.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DOUGLASS] has introduced a bill for Federal aid to schools that I shall support. I shall go farther than supporting it; I shall insist that the appropriation be increased from $75,000,000 to $225,000,000. Surely if we can afford $400,000,000 for roads, we can spare a little more than half as much for education. The gentleman comes from a State which has not only always fostered education but has always stood for thrift and economy. It is a pleasure for me, coming from a State which got many of its first school teachers from New England, to back him in his present effort to get the Federal Government to acknowledge in a substantial way its responsibility for education; for I am convinced that by appropriating funds to help the States keep their schools open during this emergency we are saving money as well as values that are worth more than money.

It must be admitted that voting Federal funds for schools is a departure from past practices. That, however, is not a good reason for refusing to do it. While it is not wise to abandon the old ways of doing things just in order to do something new, neither is it sensible to refuse to adopt new expedients when it is necessary to do so to meet new conditions. The ways of doing things which we now call old were once new. There was a time when it was an innovation to support schools by local taxation; the education of the child was the responsibility of its parents, not of the whole neighborhood. Our forefathers, in spite of objections that were then made, adopted the principle that hiring teachers and paying them was the obligation of all the people. When State aid to schools was first proposed, protests came from those who said that education was the responsibility of the school districts and not of the State. Now, when it is proposed that the Federal Government shall use its taxing power to help pay the cost of what is admittedly a national concern, some consider the proposal as dangerous and even revolutionary. But as we seem to have survived the shock of past efforts to broaden the base of educational support, so we shall escape the dire consequences which some see following in the wake of the passage of the Douglass bill.

Let me consider some of the trends and conditions which make it necessary to enact this measure. There was a time when taxable wealth and income were distributed throughout the country in about the same proportion as population. Then Federal aid would not have accomplished any useful purpose. That condition no longer exists. The business that used to go to the little flour mill at Prairie City has gone to Buffalo, N.Y., and the taxable income of the mill has gone with it, but there are still as many school children in Prairie City as there used to be. Not only the milling of flour but every other business and industry has gravitated toward a relatively few cities, where the income-producing wealth of the country is now to a large extent centered. The concentration of income has proceeded more rapidly than the concentration of population, and, as a result, while some communities can support their essential institutions without much sacrifice, others cannot support them at all. Out of this situation has arisen the necessity for legislation of the kind embodied in the Douglass bill.

Let me call your attention to some conditions which exist today in my own State. School tax levies run as high as 157 mills, tax delinquencies as high as 90 percent. In many districts bond obligations exceeding 50 percent of the assessed valuation have piled up interest charges that make it impossible to meet current expenses. In some of the distressed districts, teachers' salaries run as low as $25 a month, and in a few instances teachers have to "board around", receiving $15 or less a month in actual cash. Sixty percent of the teachers in distressed districts have been paid in warrants which are either unnegotiable or negotiable only at a discount. Outstanding warrants constitute an ever-growing obligation and in many cases have accumulated in such amounts that the banks have stopped cashing them. Some districts have paid their teachers with money from the sinking fund, defaulting interest and amortization payments on their bonds in order to do so. These facts, contained in a statement submitted by the Honorable E. M. Phillips, commissioner of education for the State of Minnesota, present a picture that challenges attention.

Continued drought, disappearing industry, unemployment, shrinking valuations, increasing tax delinquency, have brought about a situation which is not pleasant to contemplate, but which we must face courageously. Unless Federal relief is provided, one-half of the Minnesota school districts that have received aid from the Federal Emergency Relief Administration this year will not be able to open their schools in September, and other districts will open them without knowing how long they can keep them open.

Although the situation is most acute in some of the rural counties, the larger cities also are sorely distressed. In Minneapolis, where I live, expenditures for personnel have been reduced 20 percent, other expenditures 24 percent, and still there is a deficit of $1,142,000. In the neighboring city of St. Paul, a budget smaller than that of 10 years ago by $105,800, will have to provide education for 8,000 more pupils.

That the situation I have set forth is not peculiar to Minnesota is shown by figures presented by the Honorable G. F. Zook, United States Commissioner of Education. He recently reported that the cities of the country, with an enrollment 250,000 greater than in 1930, are operating their schools with 18,000 fewer teachers and $133,000,000 less money. Inasmuch as the city schools are probably much better off than those of the rural communities, it is apparent that the $75,000,000 Federal aid provided for in the Douglass bill is inadequate.

Mr. Speaker, there never was a time when trained intelligence was needed more than now. The problems confronting the Nation are increasing in number, complexity, and importance. We dare not face those problems with an uninformed electorate. I am not one of those who believe that schooling alone makes a good citizen, but I am sure that without schooling no citizen can meet adequately the responsibilities of the present and the future. During the last months there has been much concern expressed, here and elsewhere, for the future of democracy. "Revolution" and "dictatorship" are words that have been heard with disconcerting frequency. I tell you that revolution and dictatorship come to a people only when that people has become incapable of self-government. Freedom is the condition of those who know how to use it. Let us therefore guard well the foundation of democracy; let us preserve the institutions that make men fit to be free.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, we have been trying at various times to have a call of the Private Calendar. It is important that we have an early call on House bills. Later on we will ask that the House consider the Senate bills. I ask unanimous consent that it be in order today to take a recess until 7:30 o'clock, and that at the evening session bills on the Private Calendar only, unobjected to, beginning where the House left off on the previous call, be in order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. TRUAX. I object.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for tomorrow night.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, and, of course, if the majority leader insists on it, I shall not object, because I shall not oppose anything that the leader wants done. He is such a splendid leader that we all ought to follow him, but we are going to have time on our hands waiting on the Senate, so why cannot we have a call of the Private Calendar in a day session on Wednesday or Thursday or Friday or Saturday?

Mr. BYRNS. I will say that the reason I proposed tonight or tomorrow night is the fact that many Members have House bills on the calendar and would like to have them disposed of and have plenty of time to get them through the Senate. If the gentleman from Texas objects to tomorrow night, I will renew my request for Wednesday night.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not propose to interpose an objection to the gentleman's request, if our leader insists on it, for I shall be here tomorrow night and every night.

Mr. BYRNS. We have had now 3 days' rest.

Mr. BLANTON. Rest? With 16 hours a day at work each day in our offices.

Mr. BYRNS. I mean rest from legislative duties. None of us have rested from other labors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House tomorrow take a recess until 7: 30 o'clock tomorrow night, and at the evening session only bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to shall be considered, beginning at the start.

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF ALFRED HOHENLOHE AND OTHERS BY REMOVING CLOUD ON TITLE

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 6099) for the relief of Alfred Hohenlohe, Alexander Hohenlohe, Conrad Hohenlohe, and Viktor Hohenlohe by removing cloud on title.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. In order to have an understanding that we can all work together, it is understood, is it not, that what is known as the "District of Columbia old-age pension bill" will not be called up today?

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not intend to call up the House bill on old-age pensions. I might say that we have a considerable number of important bills here which it is very important should be passed today.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure of that; but in order to expedite the passage of noncontroversial bills having to do with the District of Columbia, the old-age pension bill for the District of Columbia will not be called up today?

Mr. PALMISANO. No; it will not be called up today.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the automobile responsibility bill be called up today? Does the gentleman expect to call that bill up today?

Mr. PALMISANO. Is that the code bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is the bill with regard to responsibility of automobile drivers in the District; the same bill as many States have in operation. I do not know the number of it. It is the A.A.A. bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. There is a code bill, if the gentleman has reference to that. The only insurance bill I intend to call up—there is one with reference to industrial life insurance with reference to contracts.

Mr. TREADWAY. No; that is not the bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. The last bill I intend to call up will be the taxicab liability bill. That will be the last one.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think there are two of those automobile bills.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not intend to take up the other.

Mr. TREADWAY. What is the title of the other?

Mr. PALMISANO. Does the gentleman mean the auto liability bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not intend to take that up.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman does not intend to call up that bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. No; but the taxicab liability I expect to bring up.

Mr. TREADWAY. The taxicab automobile liability insurance bill will be taken up?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes. That will be the next to the last bill which I have on the list. There are about 20 bills all told.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman expect to reach that bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes; I expect to reach it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to convey by appropriate quitclaim deed to Alfred Hohenlohe for life, with remainder to Alexander, Konrad, and Viktor Hohenlohe, their heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to lots 68 and 69 in Abner B. Kelly trustee's subdivision of part of square 628, as per plat recorded in liber W.B.M., folio 273, of the records of the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia. The true intent of this act is to relinquish and abandon, grant, give, and concede any and all right, interest, and estate, in law or equity, which the United States is or is supposed to be entitled to in part of said land by escheat because of the death of Catharine B. Hohenlohe, an Austrian citizen, unto her husband, Alfred Hohenlohe, and her minor children, Alexander Hohenlohe, Konrad Hohenlohe, and Viktor Hohenlohe, all Austrian citizens: Provided, however, That said Alfred Hohenlohe, Alexander Hohenlohe, Konrad Hohenlohe, and Viktor Hohenlohe, as such aliens, shall sell or otherwise dispose of said interest within 10 years, as provided by the United States Code, title 8, section 73, or such further period as shall be secured to them by any treaty between the United States and the Republic of Austria, or be subject to the same liabilities of escheat proceedings on behalf of the United States as are provided by title

8 of the United States Code or as shall hereafter be provided by law, said period of 10 years to commence to run from the date on which said quitclaim deed shall have been executed by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant hereto.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MISREPRESENTATION IN THE DISTRIBUTION OF MILK IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 6130) to prevent misrepresentation and deception in the sale of milk and cream in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of the act entitled "An act to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia; to define the duties of the Superintendent of Weights, Measures, and Markets of the District of Columbia; and for other purposes", approved March 3, 1921, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. (a) That bottles or other measures or containers used for the sale of milk or cream shall be of the capacity of 1 gallon, a multiple of 1 gallon, one-half gallon, 3 pints, 1 quart, 1 pint, 1 gill, or one-half gill, when filled to the bottom of the cap seat, stopple, or other designating mark. Such bottles or other measures or containers shall have clearly blown or otherwise permanently marked in the side of each such bottle or other measure or container or printed on the cap or stopple thereof, in plain bold-face gothic type, not smaller than 10 point, the name and address of the person who or the firm or corporation which shall have bottled said milk or cream. The name of no other person, firm, or corporation shall be blown or otherwise marked on such bottle or other measure or container or printed on the cap or stopple thereof. No person, firm, or corporation, for the purpose of bottling, selling, offering for sale, or delivering milk or cream, shall use caps or stopples, bottles, or other measures or containers which do not comply with the provisions of this section.

"(b) No person, firm, or corporation, in connection with the sale or delivery of milk or cream in any of the bottles or other measures or containers provided for in this section shall use any vehicle unless, on both sides of said vehicle there shall be conspicuously displayed the name and address of the person who or the firm or corporation which shall have bottled said milk or cream, and the name of no other person, firm, or corporation shall appear on any portion of any such vehicle: Provided, however, That the name of the manufacturer of such vehicle, other than a person who or a firm or corporation which may be engaged in the business of bottling or selling milk or cream, may appear on same: And provided further, That a person who or a firm or corporation which is engaged in the sale of foods in general may place the name of such person, firm, or corporation on such vehicle as may be actually employed by such person, firm, or corporation in the delivery of foods in general.

"(c) No person, firm, or corporation, in the conduct of his or its business, shall designate said business by the term 'dairy' or represent himself or itself as engaged in the dairy business unless engaged in the business of producing or bottling milk or cream."

With the following committee amendments:

On page 2, line 17, before the word "No", insert "(b) "; on line 19, after the word "in", strike out the word "this"; on line 20, after the figures "14", insert "(a)."

On page 3, beginning in line 4, after the word "further", strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert: "That the requirements of this subsection shall not apply to a person who, or a corporation which, is engaged chiefly in the sale of foods or merchandise in general, and who is not engaged in the business of bottling milk or cream"; on line 14, page 3, before the word "No", insert "(c)."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant, to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. VINSON of Georgia, DREWRY, and BRITTEN.

FIRE ESCAPES ON BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 7209) to amend an act entitled "An act to require the erection of fire escapes in certain buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", approved March 19, 1906 (34 Stat. 70), as amended by the act of March 2, 1907 (34 Stat. 1247).

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 1, 3, 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 of an act entitled "An act to require the erection of fire escapes in certain buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", approved March 19, 1906, as amended by the act of March 2, 1907, are hereby amended as follows:

Amend section 1 so as to read:

"SECTION 1. That it shall be the duty of the owner entitled to the beneficial use, rental, or control of any building three or more stories in height, or over 30 feet in height, constructed or used or intended to be used as an apartment house, tenement house, flat, rooming house, lodging house, hotel, hospital, seminary, academy, school, college, institute, dormitory, asylum, sanitarium, hall, place of amusement, office building, or store, or of any building three or more stories in height, or over 30 feet in height, other than a private dwelling, and in which sleeping quarters for the accommodation of 10 or more persons are provided above the first floor, not hereinafter exempted from the provisions of section 1 of this act, to provide and cause to be erected and fixed to every such building, connecting with each floor above the first floor by easily accessible and unobstructed openings, one or more suitable fire escapes, in such location and numbers and of such material, type, and construction as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may determine: Provided, That buildings designed and built as single-family dwellings, and converted to use as apartment houses, in which not more than three families reside, including the owner or lessee, or rooming houses in which sleeping accommodations are provided for less than 10 persons not including the family of the owner or lessee, not more than three stories, nor more than 40 feet in height, and having a total floor area not more than 3,000 square feet above the first floor, shall be exempted from the provisions of sections 1 and 3 of this act: And provided further, That buildings used solely as apartment houses, not more than three stories, nor more than 40 feet in height, so arranged that not more than five apartments per floor open directly, without an intervening hall or corridor, on a fire-resistive stairway, three feet or more in width, enclosed with masonry walls in which fire-resistive doors are provided at all openings, shall be excluded from the provisions of this section.

"That when used in this act—

"(a) An apartment house shall mean a building in which rooms in suites are provided for occupancy by three or more families.

"(b) A tenement house shall mean the same as an apartment house.

"(c) A flat shall mean the same as an apartment house.

"(d) A rooming house shall mean a building in which rooms are rented and sleeping quarters provided to accommodate 10 or more persons, not including the family of the owner or lessee.

"(e) A lodging house shall mean a building in which sleeping quarters are provided to accommodate 10 or more transients.

"(f) A hotel shall mean a building in which meals are served and rooms are provided for the accommodation of 10 or more transients.

"(g) An elevator shaft shall be construed to include a dumbwaiter shaft.

"(h) A fire escape shall mean an exterior open stairway or arrangement of ladders constructed entirely of incombustible materials and of approved design, or an interior or exterior stairway of fire-resistive construction with enclosing walls of masonry with fire-resistive doors and windows.

"(i) A standpipe shall mean a vertical iron or steel pipe provided with hose connections and valves, so arranged to supply water for fire-fighting purposes.

"(j) Fireproof shall mean the same as fire resistive as defined in the Building Code of the District of Columbia.

"(k) Fire resistive shall mean the same as fireproof."

Amend section 3 so as to read:

"SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the owner entitled to the beneficial use, rental, or control of any building used or intended to be used as set forth in section 1 of this act where fire escapes are required, or any building in which 10 or more persons are employed, as set forth in section 2 of this act where fire escapes are required; also to provide, install, and maintain therein proper and sufficient guide signs, guide lights, exit lights, hall and stairway lights, standpipes, fire extinguishers, and alarm gongs and striking stations in such location and numbers and of such type and character as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may determine: Provided, That in buildings less than six stories in height standpipes will not be required when fire extinguishers are installed in such numbers and of such type and character as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may determine."

Amend section 4 so as to read:

"SEC. 4. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to issue such orders, adopt and enforce such regulations not inconsistent with law as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes and carry into effect the provisions of this act, and to require any alterations or changes that may become necessary in buildings now or hereafter erected, in order to properly locate or relocate fire escapes or to afford access to fire escapes and to require any changes or alterations in any buildings that may be necessary in order to provide for the erection of additional fire escapes, or for the installation of other appliances required by this act, when in the judgment of said Commissioners such additional fire escapes or appliances are necessary."

Section 8 is hereby repealed.

Section 9 is hereby renumbered as section 8; the words "fire hose" are omitted and the word "standpipe" is substituted therefor in the first sentence. The words "or regulations promulgated hereunder" are hereby inserted after the word "act" in the second sentence.

Section 10 is hereby renumbered as section 9.

Section 11 is hereby renumbered as section 10, and the period at the end of the first sentence is changed to a comma and the words "or if delivered to the agent, trustee, executor, or other legal representative of the estate of such person" are inserted.

Section 12 is hereby renumbered as section 11.

Section 13 is hereby renumbered as section 12.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BOARD OF INDETERMINATE SENTENCE AND PAROLE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 8987) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes", approved July 15, 1932, and I ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes", approved July 15, 1932, be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding a new section to be numbered 10 and to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. The Board of Parole created by the act of Congress entitled 'An act to amend an act providing for the parole of United States prisoners, approved June 25, 1910, as amended', approved May 13, 1930, shall have and exercise the same power and authority over prisoners convicted in the District of Columbia of crimes against the United States and now or hereafter confined in any United States penitentiary or prison (other than the penal institutions of the District of Columbia) as is vested in the Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole over prisoners confined in the penal institutions of the District of Columbia."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE CONTROL ACT

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 9007) to amend section 11 of the District of Columbia Alcoholic Beverage Control Act, and I ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, just what does this bill do? This is not the bill which we amended and sent over to the other body, and which is still over there, which prohibits drug stores from selling outside of prescriptions, is it?

Mr. PALMISANO. Oh, no. This bill simply changes the license law for a common carrier by water, giving them the same license as a common carrier by rail.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It affects hotels, I see.

Mr. PALMISANO. No. It simply amends the law to give steamboat companies which navigate within 100 miles the same right as a railroad, as far as licenses are concerned.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11, paragraph (g), be amended to read as follows:

"(g) Retailer's license, class C: Such a license shall be issued only for a bona fide restaurant, hotel, or club, or a passenger-carrying marine vessel serving meals, or a club car or a dining car on a railroad. It shall authorize the holder thereof to keep for sale and to sell spirits, wine, and beer at the place therein described for consumption only in said place. Except in the case of clubs, hotels, and passenger-carrying marine vessels serving meals in interstate commerce of 100 miles or more, no beverage shall be sold or served to a customer in any closed container. In the case of restaurants and passenger-carrying marine vessels and club cars or dining cars on a railroad, said spirits and wine, except light wines, shall be sold or served only to persons seated at public tables, and beer and light wines shall be sold and served only to persons seated at public tables or at bona fide lunch counters, except that spirits, wine, and beer may be sold or served to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room when such room has been previously approved by the Board. In the case of hotels, said beverages may be sold and served only in the private room of a registered guest or to persons seated at public tables or to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room, when such room has been previously approved by the Board. Beer and light wines may also be sold and served to persons seated in bona fide lunch counters. And in the case of clubs, said beverages may be sold and served in the private room of a member or guest of a member or to persons seated at tables. No license shall be issued to a club which has not been established for at least 3 months immediately prior to the making of the application for such license.

"The fee for such a license shall be for a restaurant, $500 per annum; for a hotel, under 100 rooms, $500 per annum; for a hotel of 100 or more rooms, $1,000 per annum; for a club, $250 per annum; for a marine vessel serving meals in interstate commerce of 100 miles or more and for each railroad dining car or club car, $2 per month or $20 per annum; for all other passenger-carrying marine vessels serving meals, $50 per month or $500 per annum."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES FOR CHILDREN OF SOLDIERS, SAILORS, AND MARINES KILLED IN ACTION

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 9143) providing educational opportunities for the children of soldiers, sailors, and marines who were killed in action or died during the World War, and I ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, from funds to the credit of the District of Columbia in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,600, annually, for the fiscal years 1935 to 1943, inclusive, for aid in the education of children (between the ages of 16 and 21 years, inclusive, who have had their domicile in the District of Columbia for at least 5 years) of those who lost their lives during the World War as a result of service in the military or naval forces of the United States, including tuition, fees, maintenance, and the purchase of books and supplies: Provided, That not more than $200 shall be available for any one child: Provided further, That appropriations made in accordance with this act shall be expended only for such children while attending educational institutions of a secondary or college grade under rules and regulations prescribed by the Board of Education.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COLUMBUS UNIVERSITY

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 9180) relating to the incorporation of Columbus University, of Washington, D.C., organized under and by virtue of a certificate of incorporation pursuant to the incorporation laws of the District of Columbia as provided in subchapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporation of the Columbus University of Washington, District of Columbia, under chapter 18 of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, approved and confirmed, except as herein specifically altered.

SEC. 2. The number of trustees for the management of said corporation shall be not more than 14 and not less than 12 and at least two of whom shall be members of each existing council of the Knights of Columbus, each of whom shall be a member of the District of Columbia branch of the fraternal organization known and designated as the "Knights of Columbus"; that J. Fred Brady, John E. Burns, W. Francis Delaney, John P. Dunn, William G. Feely, G. E. Herring, George F. Howell, Harold Francis Jones, William E. Leahy, James P. McKeon, Walter I. Plant, T. J. Quirck, and M. J. Willcoxon shall constitute the original board of trustees under this act; that the board of trustees shall elect, from among themselves, 1 member to be president, 1 member to be vice president, 1 member to be treasurer, and 1 member to be secretary of said corporation; that the board of trustees shall elect, from among themselves, 1 member to be chairman, 1 member to be vice chairman, and 1 member to be secretary of the board of trustees; that at the first meeting of the board subsequent to the passage of this act the trustees shall be divided into three classes, the members of the first class to serve for a period of 3 years, the members of the second class to serve for a period of 4 years, and the members of the third class, which class shall include the president, vice president, treasurer, and secretary of the corporation, to serve for a period of 5 years; that the said trustee shall serve for the periods mentioned and/or until their successors are designated, the power of designation being in the board of trustees; that the number of professorships which may be established by said corporation shall be left to the discretion of the board of trustees who shall have the power to establish ordinances and by-laws for the conduct of the business of the corporation, or to alter, repeal, and amend the same, and also power to frame laws and regulations to govern the faculty and students in all departments thereof and to designate such professors and lecturers as they shall deem necessary and with such salaries and duties as the said board of trustees shall deem proper: Provided, however, That no member of the board of trustees, except the president, shall serve in a teaching capacity in the university.

SEC. 3. The said corporation shall adopt a common seal, under and by which all deeds, diplomas, and acts of the said university or corporation shall pass and be authenticated, and the same seal at their pleasure to break and alter, or to devise a new one.

SEC. 4. Persons of every religious denomination shall be eligible to membership on the faculty and that no person shall be refused admittance to the university as a pupil, or denied any of the privileges, immunities, or advantages thereof, for or on account of his or her sentiments in matters of religion.

SEC. 5. The funds, moneys, and properties of the corporation shall be held in the name of Columbus University and that the funds or the income of the corporation, or any part thereof, shall be used for no purpose or object other than to promote and advance the best interests of Columbus University.

SEC. 6. No institution of learning hereafter incorporated in the District of Columbia shall use in or as its title, in whole or in part, the words "Columbus University."

SEC. 7. Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent Congress from altering, amending, or repealing the same.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TENLEY SCHOOL

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 9184) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to sell the old Tenley School to the duly authorized representative of St. Ann's Church of the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to sell and convey to the duly constituted representative and agent of St. Ann's Roman Catholic Church, of the District of Columbia, located at or near the corner of Wisconsin Avenue and Yuma Street N.W., the following described real estate: The old Tenley School Building, and original site, known as parcels 35/130 and 131, parcel 130 containing 2,880 square feet, and parcel 131 containing 42,036 square feet, or a total of 44,916 square feet, being the same land and premises now leased to the pastor of St. Ann's Church by a certain lease signed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, dated October 16, 1933, and now included in parcel 35/260.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 9400) to exempt from taxation certain property of the American Legion in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the property situated in square 185 in the city of Washington, D.C., described as lots 32 and 33, owned, occupied, and used by the American Legion, is hereby exempt from all taxation so long as the same is so owned, occupied, and used, subject to the provisions of section 8 of the act of March 3, 1877, as amended and supplemented (D.C. Code, title 20, sec. 712), providing for exemptions of church and school property.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the word "owned" and insert in lieu thereof the words "owned and"; and in the same line, after the second word "and", insert the word "not", and after the word "used" insert "for commercial purposes."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISTRICT ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE CONTROL ACT

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 9622) to amend subsection (a) of section 23 of the District Alcoholic Beverage Control Act and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman please explain this bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. This bill merely exempts from the payment of the 50 cents per gallon tax liquor which may be exported from the District.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (a) of section 23 of the District of Columbia Alcoholic Beverage Control Act is amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. (a) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all of the following-named beverages manufactured by a holder of a manufacturer's license and on all of the said beverages imported or brought into the District of Columbia by a holder of a wholesaler's license, except beverages as may be sold to a dealer licensed under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States and not licensed under this act, and on all beverages imported or brought into the District of Columbia by a holder of a retailer's license, a tax at the following rates to be paid by the licensee in the manner hereinafter provided: ".

SEC. 2. That subsection (e) of section 23 be amended by inserting the word "taxable" after the word "upon" in the beginning of the first sentence and by inserting the word "taxable" after the word "upon" in the beginning of the second sentence.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LIFE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 195) respecting contracts of industrial life insurance in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That policies of industrial weekly payment life insurance hereafter issued or delivered in the District of Columbia shall be subject to the following conditions, in addition to any other prescribed by law and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

GOOD FAITH

SEC. 2. If payment of such a policy shall be refused because of unsound health at or prior to the date of the policy, the good faith of both applicant and insured shall constitute a material element in determining the validity of the policy; and it shall not be held invalid because of unsound health unless the insurer shall prove that, at or before the date of issue of the policy, the insured or applicant had knowledge of, or reason to know, the facts on which the defense is based, or shall prove that the insurance was procured by the insured or applicant in bad faith or with intent to defraud the company, any provision, agreement, condition, warranty, or clause contained in said policy, or endorsed thereon, or added or attached thereto, to the contrary notwithstanding. Proof by the insurer of fraud, intent to deceive, unsound health, bad faith, breach or warranty or condition precedent, or other matter of defense, shall be subject to the provisions of section 657 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D.C. Code, title 5, sec. 183).

INCONTESTABILITY

SEC. 3. Every such policy shall be incontestable upon any ground relating to health after 2 years from its date of issue (notwithstanding a longer period may be named therein), provided the insured shall be alive at the end of said period. If the policy by its terms shall be incontestable after a shorter period than herein provided, the terms of the policy with regard to such period of limitation shall govern.

ASSIGNMENT

SEC. 4. Nothing contained in the terms of any such policy shall operate to prevent its valid assignment by the insured; but the company issuing the policy so assigned shall be discharged of all liability thereon by payment of its proceeds in accordance with its terms, unless before such payment the company shall have written notice of such assignment.

BENEFICIARY

SEC. 5. Any individual designated with the consent of the insurer, evidenced by the signature of its president or secretary, or designated upon a form furnished by and filed with the insurer, as beneficiary of such a policy shall be entitled to the proceeds of such policy after the death of the insured in priority to all other claimants, and may sue in his own name for such proceeds if payment is refused by the insurer: Provided, That upon the expiration of 15 days after the death of the insured, unless proof of claim in the manner and form required by the policy, accompanied by the policy for surrender, has theretofore been made by or on behalf of such designated beneficiary, the insurer may pay to any other claimant permitted by the policy. A person specified as one to whom the insured desires payment made, but not formally designated as beneficiary, shall be deemed a beneficiary for the purposes of this section, provided such designation be made in writing and filed with the company during the lifetime of the insured.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ALLEY DWELLINGS

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1780) to provide for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in alleys in the District of Columbia, and for the replatting and development of squares containing inhabited alleys, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, safety, and welfare, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the President, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, safety, and welfare, to provide for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in alleys and to eliminate the hidden communities in inhabited alleys of the District of Columbia, and to carry out the policy declared in the act approved May 16, 1918, as amended, of caring for the alley population of the District of Columbia, the President is hereby authorized and empowered, within the limits of the amounts herein authorized—

(a) To purchase, or acquire by condemnation or gift, any land, buildings, or structures, or any interest therein, situated in or adjacent to any inhabited alley in the District of Columbia, and such other land, buildings, or structures, or any interest therein, within any square containing an inhabited alley as he may determine to be necessary for the replatting and improvement of said square pursuant to the provisions of this act;

(b) To replat any land acquired under this act; to pave or repave any street or alley thereon; to construct sewers and water mains therein; to install street lights thereon; to demolish, move, or alter any buildings or structures situated thereon and erect such buildings or structures thereon as deemed advisable: Provided, however, That the same shall be done and performed in accordance with the laws and municipal regulations of the District of Columbia applicable thereto;

(c) To lease, rent, maintain, equip, manage, exchange, sell, or convey any such lands, buildings, or structures upon such terms and conditions as he may determine: Provided, That if any such land as required for the purposes of the government of the District of Columbia such land may be transferred to the said government upon payment to the authority of the reasonable value thereof; and

(d) To aid in providing, equipping, managing, and maintaining houses and other buildings, improvements, and general community utilities on the property acquired under the provisions of this act, by loans, upon such terms and conditions as he may determine, to limited dividend corporations whose dividends do not exceed 6 percent per annum, or to home owners to enable such corporations or home owners to acquire and develop sites on the property: Provided, however, That no loan shall be made at a lower rate of interest than 5 percent per annum, and that all such loans shall be secured by reserving a first lien on the property involved for the benefit of the United States.

SEC. 2. (a) The President may designate, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, such official or agency of the Government of the United States or of the District of Columbia (hereinafter referred to as "the authority") as in his judgment is deemed necessary or advantageous, and the authority shall have or obtain all powers necessary or appropriate therefor, including the employment of necessary personal services; but (1) all plans for replatting and/or method of condemnation under the provisions of this act shall be submitted to and receive the written approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That (a) failure of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission or of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia to formally approve or disapprove in writing within 60 days after a plan has been submitted shall be equivalent to a formal approval, and (b) disapproval shall be accompanied by a written statement giving all the reasons for disapproval; and (2) any plan which shall involve action by any department, bureau, or agency of the United States or of the District of Columbia shall be made after consultation with such department, bureau, or agency.

(b) In the event condemnation proceedings are required to carry out the provisions of this act the same shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the acquisition of land in the District of Columbia for the use of the United States", approved March 1, 1929.

(c) If the authority determines in the case of any alley that it will be more advantageous to proceed in accordance with sections 1608 to 1610, inclusive, of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall be notified of such determination and proceedings shall then be had as provided in such sections for alleys and minor streets, except that if the total amount of damages awarded by the jury and the cost and expenses of the proceedings be in excess of the total amount of the assessment for benefits, such excess shall be borne and paid by the authority.

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of inaugurating the program contemplated by this act there is hereby made immediately available to the authority $500,000 of the unexpended balance of the corporate funds of the United States Housing Corporation, which sum together with all other sums received shall constitute a revolving fund to be known as the "Conversion of inhabited alleys fund" (hereinafter referred to as the "fund"). At the close of each fiscal year there shall be deducted from the fund and covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts an amount equal to the interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum upon such net amounts as may be utilized for the purpose of the act during each fiscal year.

(b) All receipts from sales, leases, or other sources shall be deposited in the fund and shall be immediately available for the purposes of this act: Provided, however, That no interest shall be chargeable upon amounts on deposit in the said fund during any period that the same shall not be utilized for the purposes of this act.

(c) For the purposes of this act the authority is hereby authorized and empowered to borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or from other Government agencies empowered to provide funds for such purposes, secured by the property and assets acquired under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. (a) The objects set forth in section 1 of this act shall be accomplished as rapidly as feasible and to this end the Authority shall, in its report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, set forth what it purposes to do during the next succeeding fiscal year. In each succeeding annual report it shall set forth its proposals for the next year.

(b) On and after July 1, 1944, it shall be unlawful to use or occupy any alley building or structure as a dwelling in the District of Columbia.

(c) No alley dwelling shall hereafter be constructed in the District of Columbia, nor shall any building or structure be moved, altered, or converted for use as an alley dwelling.

(d) Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than 6 months, or both. Each week of 7 days of the continuance of any such violation shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 5. (a) The Authority shall make a report to the President, which he shall transmit to Congress at the beginning of each regular session, giving a full and detailed account of all operations under the provisions of this act for the preceding fiscal year.

(b) Upon completion of the work contemplated by this act the President shall submit a complete report to Congress giving a full and detailed account of all operations for the entire period of operation. If such work is not completed by July 1, 1944, the President shall, on July 1, 1944, or at the opening of the next regular session of Congress after such date, make a report to Congress covering the operations under this act for the entire period to July 1, 1944, including a statement of what further work remains to be done, and recommendation for further legislation if in his opinion such legislation is necessary.

(c) It is hereby declared to be the purpose and intent of Congress that the objects set forth in section 1 of this act shall be accomplished, if possible, on or before July 1, 1944, except that loans made under this act may run for periods extending beyond such time.

SEC. 6. There shall be published three times each year during the month of January in a newspaper of general circulation published in the District of Columbia a notice to owners and tenants of alley dwellings and of other property in squares containing inhabited alleys, that alley dwellings in such squares may be demolished, removed, or vacated, and that the squares may be replatted on or before July 1, 1944.

SEC. 7. As used in this act—

(a) The term "alley" means (1) any court, thoroughfare, or passage, private or public, less than 30 feet wide at any point; and (2) any court, thoroughfare, or passage, private or public, 30 feet or more in width, that does not open directly with a width of at least 30 feet upon a public street that is at least 40 feet wide from building line to building line.

(b) The term "inhabited alley" means an alley in or appurtenant to which there are one or more alley dwellings.

(c) The term "alley dwelling" means any dwelling fronting upon or having its principal means of ingress from an alley. This definition does not include an accessory building, such as a garage, with living rooms for servants or other employees; if the principal entrance to the living rooms of the accessory building is from the street property to which it is accessory.

(d) The term "dwelling" means any building or structure used or designed to be used in whole or in part as a living or a sleeping place by one or more human beings.

(e) The term "person" includes any individual, partnership, corporation, or association.

SEC. 8. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the application thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 9. All acts and parts of acts contrary to the provisions of this act or inconsistent therewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 10. This act may be cited as the "District of Columbia Alley Dwelling Act."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 5, strike out "Sec. 3. (a)" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. (a) The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to make immediately available to the authority for its lawful uses and as needed, from the allocation made from the appropriation to carry out the purposes of the National Industrial Recovery Act, contained in the Fourth Deficiency Act, fiscal year 1933, now carried under the title 'National Industrial Recovery, Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, Housing, 1933–35', symbol 03/5666, not to exceed $500,000 of any amount thereof dedicated for low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects in the District of Columbia, to be set aside in the Treasury and be known as 'Conversion of inhabited alleys fund' (hereinafter referred to as the 'fund').

"(b) The authority is hereby authorized and empowered to borrow such moneys from individuals or private corporations as may be secured by the property and assets acquired under the provisions of this act, and such moneys, together with all receipts from sales, leases, or other sources, shall be deposited in the fund and shall be available for the purposes of this act.

"(c) The fund shall remain available until June 30, 1935, and thereafter shall be available annually in such amount as may be specified in the annual appropriation acts.

"(d) The total amount paid for property or properties acquired in any square shall not exceed 30 percent over and above the present assessed value of all the property or properties acquired in any square to carry out the provisions of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PARK AND PLANNING COMMISSION

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2508) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and the Attorney General of the United States, to make equitable adjustments of conflicting claims between the United States and other claimants of lands along the shores of the Potomac River, Anacostia River, and Rock Creek in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask some questions.

This is another bill which grants additional power and authority to the National Park and Planning Commission. We are continually giving it authority and losing control over matters of this kind. I doubt the wisdom of this action.

It is well known that it has required urgent riders on appropriation bills to keep the authorities from tearing down three of the best buildings in Washington—the Municipal Building, the Southern Railway Building, and the old Post Office Department Building. There is no better-built office building in Washington today than the Southern Railway Building. Where will you find a more picturesque, splendid building anywhere in the country than the old Post Office Department? The Municipal Building is a valuable structure. Every year American citizens spend their money to go abroad to see old buildings, buildings over 100 years old, yet just as soon as we get a building with a little age on it, we have to tear it down.

I challenge any Member of the House to show any reason in the world why these three buildings should be torn down. If we do not watch matters closely, we are liable to find sometime, when the Members get away from Washington after an adjournment and we cannot stop these things, some way will be found to tear down these three buildings. It is outrageous; it is unthinkable.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the bill which has just been called up authorize the National Park and Planning Commission, with the consent of the Attorney General, to do almost anything it wants to do about these buildings?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. I was just calling attention to the action of Congress in delegating authority that ought to be retained by Congress.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman is discussing the principle involved.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and there is a principle involved. Here is a bill which gives the National Capital Park and Planning Commission authority to do something that only Congress has the right to do.

I doubt whether it is a wise proposition for us to pass bills of this kind.

Mr. MAY. This is just another delegation of the powers of the Congress to individuals.

Mr. BLANTON. I have an understanding with the gentleman from Maryland regarding some legislation he will not call up today, and I keep my agreements. Otherwise I would oppose this bill. I have done my duty by calling attention to the unwisdom of passing such bills. I wanted us to register our disapproval of the tearing-down of these buildings in such a way that they will not dare do it when Congress adjourns and we are away from here.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not a fact that on three occasions Congress has refused to appropriate funds which would have permitted the demolition of the Post Office Building and some other buildings?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and we have had to put an inhibition in appropriation bills to stop it. They ought to understand by this time that Congress is not going to stand for any demolition of these three buildings.

Mr. LOZIER. And in contemptuous indifference to the attitude of Congress, they have built around the Post Office Building in order to create a condition which they think will force ultimately the demolition of that building.

Mr. BLANTON. If any of them dare do it, we ought to make it hot for them and put them out of public office when we come back here.

Mr. TREADWAY. But in the meantime the buildings will be destroyed.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think they will dare destroy any of these three buildings, because the House and the Senate have expressed their disapproval of that proposition many times; but I think we ought to keep the matter before them, and we ought to let them understand that Congress is not going to stand for it.

Mr. PALMISANO. Of course the gentleman does not mean that this bill should not be passed.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill is an extension of an unwise principle, but I am keeping my agreement with the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of establishing and making clear the title of the United States in and to any part or parcel of land or water in, under, and adjacent to the Potomac River, the Anacostia River, or Eastern Branch, and Rock Creek, including the shores and submerged or partly submerged land, as well as the banks of said waterways, and also the upland immediately adjacent thereto, including made land, flat lands, and marsh lands, in which persons and corporations and others may have or pretend to have any right, title, claim, or interest adverse to the complete title of the United States as set forth in an act entitled "An act providing for the protection of the interest of the United States in lands and water comprising any part of the Potomac River, the Anacostia River, Eastern Branch, and Rock Creek, and adjacent lands thereto", approved April 27, 1912 (37 Stat. 93), and in order to facilitate the same, by making equitable adjustments of such claims and controversies between the United States of America and such adverse claimants, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make and accept, on behalf of the United States, by way of compromise, when deemed to be in the public interest, such conveyances, includes deeds of quitclaim and restrictive and collateral covenants, of the lands in dispute as shall be also approved by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and the Attorney General of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HARBOR REGULATIONS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA WATER FRONT

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2714) to amend section 895 of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, vested with authority to make harbor regulations for the entire water front of the city within the District of Columbia, to alter and amend the same from time to time as they may find necessary, and to fix penalties for the violation of such regulations, which, however, shall not exceed fines of $500 or imprisonment over 6 months, or both: Provided, That whenever these regulations affect navigable waters, channels, and anchorage areas or other interests of the United States, such regulations shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That whenever said regulations affect the water front within the District of Columbia under the jurisdiction of the Director of National Parks, Buildings, and Reservations, or affect the interests and rights of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, such regulations shall be subject to prior approval of the respective agencies.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PALMISANO: Page 1, line 7, after the word "necessary", strike out the comma and everything down to and including the word "both."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF NAME OF STREET—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3257) to change the designation of Four-and-a-half Street SW. to Fourth Street.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the street designated as "Four-and-a-half Street" running south from the center of the Mall to P Street south be, and the same is hereby, changed to Fourth Street, thereby giving this street for its entire length from Pennsylvania Avenue NW. to P Street south the designation of Fourth Street.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MOUNT OLIVET CEMETERY CO.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1757) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Mount Olivet Cemetery Co. in the District of Columbia", and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Mount Olivet Cemetery Co. in the District of Columbia", approved on the 10th day of June 1862 (12 Stat.L. 426) be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding at the end of section 2 of the said act of the 10th day of June 1862 the following:

"The said corporation may use for burial purposes the tracts of land now owned by it and known, respectively, as the 'Hoover tract', designated for purposes of assessment and taxation as parcel 153/23, fronting on Bladensburg Road and the 'Merten's tract', designated for purposes of assessment and taxation as parcel 153/42, fronting on West Virginia Avenue, the said two tracts having an aggregate area of approximately 12.25 acres, and all of the provisions of the aforesaid act of the 10th day of June 1862 shall apply to both of the said tracts with like effect as if the provisions of this act had been included therein at the time of its enactment: Provided, That no part of parcel 153/23 lying within 120 feet of Bladensburg Road shall be used for burial purposes; the strip of land hereby exempted from use for burial purposes being the easterly 120 feet by full width of said parcel 153/23 fronting on Bladensburg Road."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELLEN WILSON MEMORIAL HOMES

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3442), to dissolve the Ellen Wilson Memorial Homes and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the body corporate and politic created under the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Ellen Wilson Memorial Homes", approved March 3, 1915, be, and the same is hereby, granted the right to dissolve under the supervision of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and to have its assets distributed among the persons determined by said court to be entitled thereto, all in the manner prescribed by subchapter 14 of the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended; and jurisdiction over said corporation for the purposes aforesaid is hereby conferred upon said court as fully and effectually as though said corporation had been created pursuant to the general incorporation provision contained in the last-mentioned act, as amended.

SEC. 2. That Congress reserves the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL SOCIETY UNITED STATES DAUGHTERS OF 1812

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2580) to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society United States Daughters of 1812 in the District of Columbia and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the bill the gentleman is now taking up?

Mr. PALMISANO. Private Calendar 924.

Mr. PATMAN. That was not on the calendar, as I understood it, to be considered today. I reserve the right to object to inquire of the gentleman if he expects to take up the taxicab liability insurance bill later on?

Mr. PALMISANO. I have been requested to hold off the taxicab liability bill until we consider the auto liability bill.

TAXICAB INSURANCE BILL

Mr. PATMAN. Further reserving the right to object, may I have an agreement with the gentleman that he will divide the time of the opposition on this bill with me? I am the only member of the committee who will oppose the bill, and I should like to have an understanding that he will divide the time with me. Since the committee is composed of 21 members and I am the only one opposing the bill and will certainly have a hard fight in view of the custom of other members to follow the committee, I must insist on at least 30 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there seems to be considerable confusion as to the two different automobile bills that the gentleman has on his calendar. The one he is now referring to in colloquy with the gentleman from Texas seems to be Report No. 1604, House Calendar 281.

Mr. PALMISANO. House Calendar No. 281.

Mr. TREAWAY. I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] objects to that bill. There is another bill, House Calendar No. 275, favorably reported, called the bill to promote safety on streets and highways, and so forth. Would it be possible to call up that bill instead of the objectionable bill first?

Mr. PALMISANO. As I stated to the gentleman from Texas, I have been requested to withhold calling up the taxicab liability bill and to consider the auto liability bill first.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman agree to divide the 1 hour's time on the bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. Unless a Member on the opposite side desires recognition, I have no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman understands that I am the only one on the committee objecting to this bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. I have no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman will divide the time with me?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman call up House Calendar 275? That is the one I am speaking of now.

Mr. PALMISANO. I shall call that up in a moment.

Mr. TREADWAY. And before there is any argument raised about the other measure?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman very much.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE BLIND OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 8517) to provide for needy blind persons of the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman has changed his calendar entirely. I had a list of the bills that would be called up and the order in which they would be called up. This bill was supposed to be called up after the taxi liability insurance bill. I think the bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. This is a very far-reaching bill unless it has been materially amended. We should pass a law for the District of Columbia that would be a good model for the States to adopt. This bill involves a good principle, one that I approve and expect to vote for, but I think the legislation should be more carefully considered, unless it has been amended. I hope the gentleman will withhold the bill for the present, and I will help him pass it after I see the bill and the proposed amendments.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Texas, I withdraw the request for the present.

OPERATION OF MOTOR VEHICLES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 1646) to promote safety on the streets and highways of the District of Columbia by providing for the financial responsibility of owners and operators of motor vehicles for damages caused by motor vehicles on the public highways in the District of Columbia; to prescribe penalties for the violation of the provisions of this act, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall in no respect be considered as a repeal of any of the provisions of the traffic acts for the District of Columbia, but shall be construed as supplemental thereto.

SEC. 2. The motor-vehicle operator's or chauffeur's license and all of the registration certificates of any person who shall by a final order or judgment have been convicted of or shall have forfeited any bond or collateral given for a violation of any of the following provisions of law, to wit—

Driving while under the influence of intoxicating liquor or narcotic drugs, as provided in section 10 of the traffic acts of the District of Columbia;

Leaving the scene of an automobile accident in which personal injury occurs without making identity known, as provided in section 10 of said traffic acts;

Such other violations as constitute cause for suspension or revocation of licenses in the District of Columbia; or

A conviction of an offense in any other State, which if committed in the District of Columbia would be a violation of any of the aforesaid provisions of the traffic acts of the District of Columbia; shall be suspended by the director of traffic (hereinafter called the director) because of such conviction and shall remain so suspended and shall not at any time thereafter be renewed, nor shall any other motor vehicle be thereafter registered in his name until he shall give proof of his ability to respond thereafter in damages resulting from the ownership or operation of a motor vehicle and arising by reason of personal injury to or death of any one person of at least $5,000, and, subject to the aforesaid limit for each person injured or killed, of at least $10,000 for such injury to or the death of two or more persons in any one accident, and for damage to property of at least $1,000 resulting from any one accident. Such proof in said amounts shall be furnished for each motor vehicle owned or registered by such person. If any such person shall fail to furnish said proof his operator's license and registration certificates shall remain suspended and shall not at any time thereafter be renewed, nor shall any other motor vehicle be thereafter registered in his name until such time as said proof be given. If such person shall not be a resident of the District of Columbia, the privilege of operating any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia and the privilege of operation within the District of Columbia of any motor vehicle owned by him shall be withdrawn until he shall have furnished such proof: Provided, That in case of both residents and nonresidents, however, if it shall be duly established to the satisfaction of the director, and the director shall so find (a) that any such person so convicted, or who shall have pled guilty or forfeited bond or collateral, was, upon the occasion of the violation upon which such conviction, plea, or forfeiture was based, a chauffeur or motor-vehicle operator, however designated, in the employ of the owner of such motor vehicle, or a member of the same family and household of the owner of such motor vehicle; and (b) that there was not, at the time of such violation, or subsequent thereto, up to the date of such finding, any motor vehicle registered in the District of Columbia in the name of such person convicted, entering a plea of guilty, or forfeiting bond or collateral, as aforesaid, then in such event, if the person in whose name such motor vehicle is registered shall give proof of ability to respond in damages, in accordance with the provisions of this act (and the director shall accept such proof from such person), such chauffeur or other person, as aforesaid, shall thereupon be relieved of the necessity of giving such proof in his own behalf. It shall be the duty of the clerk of the court, or of the court where it has no clerk, in which any such judgment or order is rendered or other action taken to forward immediately to the director a certified copy or transcript thereof. A certified copy or transcript of the judgment, order, or record of other action of the court shall be prima facie evidence of such conviction therein stated.

SEC. 3. The operator's license and all of the registration certificates of any person, in the event of his failure to satisfy every judgment arising from an accident, or accidents, happening subsequently to the effective date of this act and which shall have become final by expiration without appeal of the time within which appeal might have been perfected or by final affirmance on appeal, rendered against him by a court of competent jurisdiction in the District of Columbia or any State, or in a district court of the United States, for damages on account of personal injury, or damages to property in excess of $100, resulting from the ownership or operation of a motor vehicle by him, his agent, or any other person with the express or implied consent of the owner, shall be forthwith suspended by the director, upon receiving a certified copy of such final judgment or judgments from the court in which the same are rendered and shall remain so suspended and shall not be renewed, nor shall any other motor vehicle be thereafter registered in his name while any such judgment remains unstayed, unsatisfied, and subsisting, and until the said person gives proof of his ability to respond in damages, as required in section 4 of this act, for future accidents. It shall be the duty of the clerk of the court in which any such judgment is rendered to forward immediately to such director a certified copy of such judgment or a transcript thereof. In the event the defendant is a nonresident, it shall be the duty of the director to transmit to the commissioner of motor vehicles (or officer in charge of the issuance of operators' permits and registration certificates) of the State of which the defendant is a resident a certified copy of the said judgment. If after such proof has been given any other such judgment shall be recovered against such person for any accident occurring before such proof was furnished, and after the effective date of this act such license and certificates shall again be and remain suspended while any such judgment remains unsatisfied and subsisting: Provided, however, That (1) when $5,000 has been credited upon any judgment or judgments rendered in excess of that amount for personal injury to or the death of one person as the result of any one accident; (2) when, subject to the limit of $5,000 for each person, the sum of $10,000 has been credited upon any judgments rendered in excess of that amount for personal injury to or the death of more than one person as the result of any one accident; or (3) when $1,000 has been credited upon any judgment or judgments rendered in excess of that amount for damage to property as the result of any one accident resulting from the ownership or operation of a motor vehicle by such judgment debtor, his agent, or any other person, with his express or implied consent, then and in such event such payment or payments shall be deemed a satisfaction of such judgment or judgments for the purposes of this section only.

Whenever any motor vehicle, after the passage of this act, shall be operated upon the streets and highways of the District of Columbia by any person other than the owner, with the consent of the owner, express or implied, the operator thereof shall, in case of accident, be deemed to be the agent of the owner of such motor vehicle.

If any such motor-vehicle owner or operator shall not be a resident of the District of Columbia, the privilege of operating any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia and the privilege of operation within the District of Columbia of any motor vehicle owned by him shall be withdrawn, while any final judgment procured against him for damages, including personal injury or death caused by the operation of any motor vehicle, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, shall be unstayed, unsatisfied, and subsisting, and until he shall have given proof of his ability to respond in damages for future accidents as required in section 4 of this act.

In all cases of persons who have been tried and convicted or pled guilty of violations of traffic laws of the District of Columbia the operation by a nonresident or with his express or implied consent, if an owner of a motor vehicle, on any public street or highway of the District of Columbia, shall be deemed equivalent to an appointment by such nonresident of the director or his successor in office to be his true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all lawful processes in any action or proceedings against him growing out of any accident or collision in which said nonresident may be involved while so operating or so permitting to be operated a motor vehicle on any such street or highway, and said operation shall be a signification of his agreement that any such process against him, which is so served, shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served upon him personally. Service of such process shall be made by leaving a copy of the process with a fee of $2 in the hands of the director, or in his office, and such service shall be sufficient service upon the said nonresident: Provided, That notice of such service and a copy of the process are forthwith sent by registered mail by the plaintiff, or his attorney, to the defendant, and the defendant's return receipt appended to the writ and entered with the declaration. The court in which the action is pending may order such continuances as may be necessary to afford the defendant a reasonable opportunity to defend the action.

SEC. 4. Proof of ability to respond in damages when required by this act may be evidenced by the written certificate or certificates of any insurance carrier, duly authorized to do business within the District of Columbia, or in the case of a nonresident, by an insurance carrier authorized to transact business in any of the several States, that it has issued to or for the benefit of the person named therein a motor-vehicle liability policy or policies as defined in this act which, at the date of said certificate or certificates, is in full force and effect and designating therein by explicit description or by other appropriate reference all motor vehicles with respect to which coverage is granted by the policy certified to. The director shall not accept any certificate or certificates unless the same shall cover all motor vehicles registered in the name of the person furnishing such proof. Additional certificates as aforesaid shall be required as a condition precedent to the registration of any additional motor vehicle or motor vehicles in the name of such person required to furnish proof as aforesaid. Said certificate or certificates shall certify that the motor-vehicle liability policy or policies therein cited shall not be canceled except upon 10 days' prior written notice thereof to the director.

Such proof may be the bond of a surety company duly authorized to do business within the District of Columbia or a bond with at least two individual sureties, each owning unencumbered real estate in the District of Columbia, approved by a judge of a court of record, which said bond shall be conditioned for the payment of the amounts specified in section 2 hereof and shall not be cancelable except after 10 days' written notice to the director. Such bond shall constitute a lien in favor of the District of Columbia upon the real estate of any surety, which lien shall exist in favor of any holder of any final judgment on account of damage to property over $100 in amount or injury to any person or persons caused by the operation of such person's motor vehicle, upon the filing of notice to that effect by the director in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Such proof of ability to respond in damages may also be evidence presented to the director of a deposit by such person with the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia of a sum of money or collateral, the amount of which money or collateral shall be $11,000. But the said clerk shall not accept a deposit of money or collateral where any judgment or judgments, theretofore recovered against person as a result of damages arising from the operation of any motor vehicle, shall not have been paid in full. The said clerk shall accept any such deposit and issue a receipt therefor.

The director shall be notified of the cancelation or expiration of any motor-vehicle liability policy of insurance certified under the provisions of this act at least 10 days before the effective date of such cancelation or expiration. In the absence of such notice of cancelation or expiration said policy of insurance shall remain in full force and effect. Additional evidence of ability to respond in damages shall be furnished the director at any time upon his demand.

SEC. 5. Such bond, money, or collateral shall be held by the said clerk to satisfy, in accordance with the provisions of this act, any execution issued against such person in any suit arising out of damage caused by the operation of any motor vehicle owned or operated by such person. Money or collateral so deposited shall not be subject to attachment or execution unless such attachment or execution shall arise out of a suit for damages, including injury to property, and personal injury or death, as a result of the operation of a motor vehicle. If a final judgment rendered against the principal on the surety or real-estate bond shall not be satisfied within 30 days after its rendition, the judgment creditor may, for his own use and benefit and at his sole expense, bring an action in the name of the District of Columbia against the company or persons executing such bond.

SEC. 6. The director shall, upon request, furnish any insurer, person, or surety a certified abstract of the operating record of any person subject to the provisions of this act, which abstract shall fully designate the motor vehicles, if any, registered in the name of such person, and if there shall be no record of any conviction of such person of a violation of any provision of any statute relating to the operation of a motor vehicle or of any injury or damage caused by such person as herein provided the director shall so certify. The director shall collect for each such certificate the sum of $1.

SEC. 7. The director shall furnish any person who may have been injured in person or property by any motor vehicle, upon written request, with all information of record in his office pertaining to the evidence of the ability of any operator or owner of any motor vehicle to respond in damages.

SEC. 8. Any operator or any owner whose operator's license or certificate of registration shall have been suspended as herein provided, or whose policy of insurance or surety bond shall have been canceled or terminated, or who shall neglect to furnish additional evidence of ability to respond in damages upon request of the director shall immediately return to the director his operator's license, certificate of registration, and the number plates issued thereunder. If any person shall fail to return to the director the operator's license, certificate of registration, and the number plates issued thereunder as provided herein, the director shall forthwith direct any member of the Metropolitan Police of the District of Columbia to secure possession thereof and to return the same to the office of the director. Any person failing to return on demand such operator's license or such certificate and number plates shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not more than $100, and such penalty shall be in addition to any penalty imposed for any violation of the provisions of the traffic acts as given in section 2 of this act. The amount of such fine shall be paid in the manner provided for the payment of fines for violations of the traffic acts.

SEC. 9. The director may cancel such bond or return such evidence of insurance, or the clerk may, with the consent of the director, return such money or collateral to the person furnishing the same, provided 3 years shall have elapsed since the filing of such evidence or the making of such deposit, during which period such person shall not have violated any provision of the traffic acts referred to in section 2, and provided no suit or judgment for damages on account of personal injury or damage to property in excess of $100 resulting from the operation of motor vehicle by him or his agent shall then be outstanding against such person. The director may direct the return of any money or collateral to the person who furnished the same upon the acceptance and substitution of other evidence of his ability to respond in damages or, at any time after 3 years from the expiration of any registration or license issued to such person, provided no written notice shall have been filed with the director stating that such suit has been brought against such person by reason of the ownership, maintenance, or operation of a motor vehicle, and upon the filing by such person with the director of an affidavit that he has abandoned his residence in the District of Columbia or that he has made a bona fide sale of any and all motor vehicles owned by him and does not intend to own or operate any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia for a period of 1 or more years.

SEC. 10. Any person who by any other law of the District of Columbia is required to make provision for the payment of loss occasioned by injury to or death of persons or damage to property shall, to the extent of such provision so made and not otherwise, be exempt from this act.

SEC. 11. Any person who shall forge or without authority sign any evidence of ability to respond in damages as required by the director in the administration of this act shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 or imprisoned not to exceed 1 year, or both.

SEC. 12. "Motor-vehicle liability policy" as used in this act shall be taken to mean a policy of liability insurance issued to the person therein named as insured by an insurance carrier authorized to transact business in the District of Columbia or, in the case of a nonresident, by an insurance carrier authorized to transact business in any of the several States, which policy shall designate, by explicit description or by appropriate reference, all motor vehicles with respect to which coverage is intended to be granted by said policy, and shall insure the insured named therein and any other person using or responsible for the use of any such motor vehicle with the consent, express or implied, of such insured, against loss from the liability imposed upon such insured by law or upon such other person for injury to or death of any person, other than such person or persons as may be covered, as respects such injury or death by any workmen's compensation law, or damage to property except property of others in charge of the insured or the insured's employees growing out of the maintenance, use, or operation of any such motor vehicle in the United States of America; or which policy shall, in the alternative, insure the person therein named as insured against loss from the liability imposed by law upon such insured for injury to or death of any person, other than such person or persons as may be covered as respects such injury or death by any workmen's compensation law, or damage to property, except property of others in charge of the insured or the insured's employees, growing out of the operation or use by such insured of any motor vehicle, except a motor vehicle registered in the name of such insured, and occurring while such insured is personally in control, as driver or occupant, of such motor vehicle within the United States of America, to the amount or limit of $5,000, exclusive of interest and costs, on account of injury to or death of any one person, and, subject to the same limit as respects injury to or death of one person of $10,000, exclusive of interest and costs, on account of any one accident resulting in injury to or death of more than one person; and of $1,000 for damage to property of others, as herein provided, resulting from any one accident; or a binder pending the issuance of any such policy, or an endorsement to an existing policy as hereinafter provided: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as preventing such insurance carrier from granting any lawful coverage in excess of or in addition to the coverage herein provided for, nor from embodying in such policy any agreements, provisions, or stipulations not contrary to the provisions of this act and not otherwise contrary to law: Provided, however, That separate concurrent policies covering, respectively, (a) personal injury or death, as aforesaid, and (b) property damage, as aforesaid, shall be considered a motor-vehicle liability policy within the meaning of this act.

No motor-vehicle liability policy shall be issued or delivered in the District of Columbia until a copy of the form of policy shall have been on file with the superintendent of insurance for at least 30 days, unless sooner approved in writing by the superintendent of insurance, nor if within said period of 30 days the superintendent of insurance shall have notified the carrier in writing that in his opinion, specifying the reasons therefor, the form of policy does not comply with the laws of the District of Columbia. The superintendent of insurance shall approve any form of policy which discloses the name, address, and business of the insured, the coverage afforded by such policy, the premium charged therefor, the policy period, the limit of liability, and the agreement that the insurance thereunder is provided in accordance with the coverage defined in this section as respects personal injury and death or property damage, or both, and is otherwise subject to all the provisions of the act.

Such motor-vehicle liability policy shall be subject to the following provisions, which need not be contained therein:

(a) The liability of any company under a motor-vehicle liability policy shall become absolute whenever loss or damage covered by said policy occurs, and the satisfaction by the insured of a final judgment for such loss or damage shall not be a condition precedent to the right or duty of the carrier to make payment on account of such loss or damage. No such policy shall be canceled or annulled as respects any loss or damage by any agreement between the carrier and the insured after the said insured has become responsible for such loss or damage, and any such cancelation or annulment shall be void. Upon the recovery of a final judgment against any person for any such loss or damage, if the judgment debtor was at the accrual of the cause of action insured against liability therefor under a motor-vehicle liability policy, the judgment creditor shall be entitled to have the insurance money applied to the satisfactien of the judgment. But the policy may provide that the insured, or any other person covered by the policy, shall reimburse the company for payments made on account of any accident, claim, or suit involving a breach of the terms, provisions, or conditions of the policy; and further, if the policy shall provide for limits in excess of the limits designated in this section, the insurance carrier may plead against such judgment creditor, with respect to the amount of such excess limits of liability, any defenses which it may be entitled to plead against the insured. Any such policy may further provide for the prorating of the insurance thereunder with other applicable valid and collectible insurance.

(b) The policy, the written application therefor (if any), and any rider or endorsement which shall not conflict with the provisions of this act shall constitute the entire contract between the parties.

(c) The insurance carrier shall, upon the request of the insured, deliver to the insured for filing, or at the request of the insured shall file direct, with the director of traffic an appropriate certificate as set forth in section 4 hereof.

(d) Any carrier authorized to issue motor-vehicle liability policies as provided for in this act may, pending the issue of such a policy, execute an agreement, to be known as a binder; or may, in lieu of such a policy, issue an endorsement to an existing policy, each of which shall be construed to provide indemnity or protection in like manner and to the same extent as such a policy. The provisions of this section shall apply to such binders and endorsements.

SEC. 13. The following words, as used in this act, shall have the following meanings:

(a) The singular shall include the plural. The masculine shall include the feminine and neuter, as requisite.

(b) "Persons" shall include individuals, partnerships, corporations, receivers, referees, trustees, executors, and administrators; and shall also include the owner of any motor vehicle, as requisite, but shall not include the District of Columbia.

(c) "Motor vehicle" shall include trailers, motorcycles, and tractors.

SEC. 14. The directors shall make rules and regulations necessary for the administration of this act.

SEC. 15. Nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the plaintiff in any action at law from relying for security upon the other processes provided by law.

SEC. 16. If any part, subdivision, or section of this act shall be deemed unconstitutional, the validity of its remaining provisions shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 17. This act shall go into effect 90 days after its passage and approval by the President of the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, there are in operation on the streets of the District of Columbia approximately 150,000 motor vehicles. These vehicles are operated by nearly 200,000 different drivers. The safe movement of these units of transportation along the streets and boulevards and around the confusing circles is one of the greatest problems confronting the people of the District of Columbia.

We must expect that with such a mass movement of vehicles in the hands of operators of various temperaments that there will be accidents. During the year 1933, 80 people were killed and 755 were injured on the streets of Washington. Since January 1 of the current year 52 people have been killed. Thus it is evident that our record for motor deaths during 1934 will be materially above that for last year. Obviously, drastic steps must be taken to remove the specter of death from our arteries of vehicular traffic. The question of how we can best do this is, I believe, one of the most important from a humanitarian standpoint confronting the present Congress.

Fortunately we have before us a measure that will help materially to solve the problem. It is the safety-responsibility law designed to control drunken, reckless, and irresponsible drivers of motor vehicles. The efficacy of such legislation has already been proven in 21 States and 9 Provinces of Canada, where similar laws have been in effect for some time. Included in the States having this progressive safety legislation is the State of Maryland to the north and the State of Virginia to the south. It is interesting to note that not a single State, once having adopted this legislation, has taken a backward step in regard to same; but, on the contrary, succeeding sessions of the legislatures have strengthened its provisions.

During the past week we have had here in Washington one of the greatest safety conferences ever held in the history of the country. I refer to the National Conference on Street and Highway Safety, presided over by the able Secretary of Commerce, Daniel C. Roper. This conference, without a dissenting vote, wrote into the uniform motor-vehicle code the provisions of the financial-responsibility bill now before us for adoption.

What is the objective of this legislation? It is threefold in character:

First, to provide an incentive for careful and safe driving and to control or eliminate the reckless and irresponsible operator.

Second, to compel those drivers who have demonstrated their recklessness to establish evidence for financial responsibility for their negligent acts in the future as a prerequisite to their regaining the privilege of driving.

Third, to furnish an incentive for payment of otherwise uncollectible judgments arising from automobile accidents.

The American Automobile Association, which has consistently supported this legislation, and in which I have the greatest confidence as an agency seriously concerned with the highway-accident problem, informs me that if the safety-responsibilty law is enacted for the District of Columbia, approximately 450 reckless and financially irresponsible operators of motor vehicles would be prohibited from using the streets of the National Capital each year. This number represents virtually two out of every three arrested annually for driving while intoxicated. The estimate of the A.A.A. is based on results secured elsewhere under similar legislation.

If this experience held true in the District of Columbia, approximately 700 operators would have their licenses and permits withdrawn each year as a result of conviction for driving while intoxicated, or leaving the scene of an accident where there was a personal injury without making their identity known. Of the 700, about 250 would regain their driving privileges by proving their financial responsibility for future accidents they may cause. The remaining 450 would be denied the privilege of using the streets.

Motorists who feel the weight of the safety-responsibilty law will be those, and only those, who bring themselves within the scope of its provisions through a serious infraction of the motor laws, or failure to satisfy a legally rendered judgment. Surely, it is a great achievement, when, without injustice or penalty on the careful, the proven reckless who have only themselves to blame for the loss of their driving privileges, can be "ruled off the road." I am sure that everyone will agree with me that they are better off the road than on it.

I commend to my colleagues this safety legislation, and urge that you do that which has already been done by a previous Congress—pass this legislation and send it on to the Senate with the hope that this time the Senate will concur and that the people of the District of Columbia may have the benefits of strong safety legislation.

LIABILITY INSURANCE ON AUTOMOBILES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I should like to ask the chairman if this is not the bill that requires the operator of an automobile to take out insurance if he has had an accident for which he was irresponsible, in other words, if he has been guilty of negligence?

As I understand, no operator of a motor vehicle in the District of Columbia will be required to carry insurance unless he has first been guilty of carelessness of some kind.

Mr. PALMISANO. As I understand it, he must be convicted of injuring someone before he is required to obtain insurance.

Mr. PATMAN. And only upon that condition and such other conditions that are outlined in the bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not a further fact that this bill has been copied in 21 States, so that it is providing legislation in the District of Columbia that is uniform with the legislation on the statute books of 21 States of the Union?

Mr. PALMISANO. As a matter of fact, I understand there are more than 21 States that have such legislation. This is a sort of uniform law which they are attempting to pass throughout the country.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, and if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, of course, this exemption of a first bite does not exist in the law of many of the other States. In most of the States, as I understand it, the necessity for insurance exists whether the person has had an accident or not. Therefore this is an exception and could not be called a uniform law.

Mr. TREADWAY. I may say that my experience is limited to my home State of Massachusetts. There the gentleman from New York is correct in saying that there is compulsory insurance for everybody. I am sorry to say the law does not seem to have been entirely satisfactory. It evidently makes insurance rates higher than some people think they should be, and there the original exemption does not occur. This bill, which, I understand, is a duplicate of many other bills, is advocated by the American Automobile Association, and simply calls for protection to the extent it applies to more or less irresponsibility on the part of drivers.

Mr. O'CONNOR. This bill only applies to taxi drivers?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; this is a general bill. The gentleman is confused on that point.

Mr. PALMISANO. Of course, the taxi drivers will be included and will come under this bill as well as the others.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT FURNITURE FACTORY BILL

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent of the House I submit for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following remarks I made today before the subcommittee of the House Post Office Committee, of which Mr. HAINES, of Pennsylvania, is chairman, the subject before the Committee being the new bill for the establishment of a Government post-office-furniture factory at Reedsville, W.Va.

The revised bill of my friend from West Virginia, Mr. RANDOLPH, embodying the Reedsville furniture factory proposition is not a particle different, in principle or in essence, from the same proposition against which the Congress already has registered its dissent by an overwhelming majority and my duty to my district, to my country, and to my conscience requires me to continue to register my opposition to this sort of legislation.

The new bill would put the Government into direct and destructive competition with private enterprise and its enactment would be a dangerous step because it would tend to lead the Government God knows where in the direction of sovietizing all industry.

I am opposed to the bill for two primary reasons:

1. It would destroy an old-established factory in my district and would drive out of employment and perhaps to the charity rolls the good citizens and their families who are now supported by that factory.

2. It would by deliberate legislative act recognize the right of the Government to establish factories, with all the wealth of the United States Treasury behind them, to compete with and crush out of business factories established by private capital.

Of these two objections the last one is by far the more important. The first objection is infinitesimally insignificant compared with the last one.

I am unwilling to see one of the cherished institutions of my city wiped out and my constituents ground in the crucible of unemployment and poverty, but I am doubly unwilling to see a precedent established that might be broadened and developed into a Soviet state with its natural and inevitable concomitant, the nationalization and regimentation of all industries and all workers. This would sound the death knell of individual liberty in America. This is a prospect too terrible to contemplate. It is a prospect the very possibility of which should put us on guard. Like most of the Members of Congress, including you whom I am addressing, I take my responsibilities seriously. I have not forgotten, and I hope I never shall forget, that we who are trying to serve our country in Congress in these days of flux, in these days when cherished institutions are subjected to a great strain, are the guardians of posterity. We should try to see clearly and should pray that no innocent misstep of ours will wreck our form of government or mar the purposes of the Constitution, the greatest chart of human freedom ever struck from the brain of man. I believe this bill, insignificant and innocent as it may appear, involves a real menace to posterity.

There is one other objection I have to the bill which, while not of major importance, is, I think, quite important.

It illustrates the lavishness which too often accompanies the expenditure of the money derived from taxation. The Government never does anything as economically as private enterprise can do it. When this proposition was being debated in the House earlier in the year, a gentleman from North Carolina made a bona fide offer in written form to supply the Government a complete wood-working factory, capable of manufacturing all the post-office equipment in the country for $52,500, or 0.1 of the amount which the Government at that time proposed to use in the establishment of its factory. Yet this new bill, now before you, raises the limit to be spent and proposes to increase to $650,000 the Government's appropriation to establish a Government factory. In other words, it is now proposed to spend on this Government factory more than 12 times the amount for which a completely equipped factory can be purchased. Would that be fair to the taxpayers? Does this Congress really propose to spend $650,000 to establish an experimental factory, when an existing established factory in complete running order could be bought for $52,500? If I were to approve that expenditure I would be haunted forever by my broken promises, for I promised my people that I would stand firm for economy in government.

NATION APPRECIATES MRS. ROOSEVELT

I have only love in my heart for the great souls that are promoting this legislation. I am a thousand percent with them in all the essential features of their great program of humanitarian activities for the amelioration of the human race. I yield to no one in my admiration of the First Lady of the Land. According to my way of thinking, among all of the First Ladies I have known she fills that office—for it is an office—most acceptably, most magnificently. I have learned in a long career of hard knocks that in this vale of tears we can do nothing better, we can do nothing finer, we can do nothing grander than to help our fellow beings over the rough places of life. Judged by that exalted rule, the First Lady is the greatest success of all those who have occupied her exalted station. I like her because she is singularly blessed with the human touch. She is always searching out ways to do good. If ever a person demonstrated love for her fellow beings she has demonstrated that, and, as I witness her untiring efforts to serve, it appears to me that the poorer, the humbler, the more forlorn, the more God-forsaken the individual is, the greater is her love. I say God bless Mrs. Roosevelt. The Nation needs her, and as one American who appreciates what a splendid First Lady we have, I extend my very best wishes to her and express the hope that she may have many more years of usefulness in the White House.

The question before your subcommittee, however, in the consideration of this bill is not whether the First Lady is a splendid woman. We all know that she is. The question is not whether her ministrations in general are a blessing to the poor and unfortunate in the dark night through which we are passing. We all know that they are. The question that is really before you in this particular instance is whether it is wise and advisable for the Government to set up a factory to compete with private enterprise. We are called upon to decide whether it is wise and advisable for the Government to establish a factory that will utterly destroy and take over the business of a factory that is now operated by American private citizens on private capital.

My belief is that we should shun the establishment of that precedent as a nation would avoid a war or a pestilence and as an individual would shun a rattlesnake. It will not be long, as time flies, until all of us, including the noble-hearted sponsors of this measure, will be in our tombs. After us, what? The Government furniture factory will not die with us. The time may come when we shall have in the White House some man who is not gifted with the nobility of purpose of our present Chief Executive; some tyrant reaching out for power. Looking at that Government furniture plant in West Virginia he may say:

"Here I have it! Here is just the precedent I want. Here is a factory that makes screen-line equipment for the Government. Nearly everything that is manufactured is used in some form by the Government. Why not establish factories to manufacture everything the Government uses, and thus drive private enterprise out of business and sovietize America?"

THE ROAD TO DISASTER

And why not, if this bill goes through and this precedent is established? The sure way to safeguard the country against this calamity is to abandon this bill. The sure way is for Members whose districts may be affected by such a policy to vote against this bill. The Government uses vast numbers of automobiles and trucks. Do the Members of Congress from automobile centers want this precedent established? The Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Civilian Conservation Corps, and other Government agencies buy vast numbers of shoes made in New England and in factory cities of the East and Midwest. Do the Members of Congress from those districts want this precedent established? The Government is an enormous consumer of cotton bagging and cotton twine. Do the Members of Congress from the cotton-growing States want this precedent established? The Government makes purchases on a large scale of typewriters, clothing, electric-light bulbs, and a thousand and one varieties of supplies that are now privately manufactured and that give employment in the aggregate to millions of American workmen. Do the Members of Congress from those districts want to establish this precedent, so that ultimately the millions of American citizens who now enjoy the blessings of private life as employees of private factories may ultimately be taken over and bossed by the Government in a system under which they will be regimented by bureaucratic orders from Washington? This is a serious matter, in its meaning and implications. I believe Members of Congress will treat it with the seriousness it deserves. If all the Members of Congress who have factories and other private activities in their districts that may logically be put out of business if this precedent is established will realize what it means, they will vote against the bill introduced by my friend, the gentleman from West Virginia; and if all of them do that, it will get hardly any votes.

REQUIRING FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY OF CAB OWNERS

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 5043) to require financial responsibility of owners and operators of vehicles for hire in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia is hereby directed to require any and all corporations, companies, associations, joint-stock companies, or associations, partnerships, and persons, their lessees, trustees, or receivers, appointed by any court whatsoever, operating, controlling, managing, or renting any passenger motor vehicles for hire in the District of Columbia, except as to operations licensed under paragraph 31 (b) of the act approved July 1, 1932, known as the "License Act" and except such common carriers as have been expressly exempted from the jurisdiction of the Commission, to file with the Commission a bond or bonds, policy or policies of liability insurance in such amount or amounts as may be required from time to time by the Commission, conditioned for the payment to any person of any judgment recovered against such corporations, companies, associations, joint-stock companies, or associations, partnerships, and persons, their lessees, trustees, or receivers, appointed by any court whatsoever, or renters of their cabs for death or for injury to any person or injury to any property, or both, caused in the operation, maintenance, use, or by reason of the defective construction of such motor cabs or other vehicles. Any such bond or undertaking or policy of liability insurance shall be in such form and on such terms or conditions as the Commission may direct. Any such policy of liability insurance shall be issued only by such insurance companies as may have been approved by the Commission, and any such bond or undertaking shall be secured by a corporate surety approved by the Commission. No such bond or policy of insurance may be canceled or terminated unless not less than 20 days prior to such cancelation or termination notice of intention so to do has been filed in writing with the Commission. It shall be unlawful to operate any vehicle subject to the provisions of this paragraph unless such vehicle shall be covered by an approved bond or policy of liability insurance as provided herein. The Commission shall have the power to make all reasonable rules and regulations which, in its opinion, are necessary to make effective the purposes of this paragraph.

SEC. 2. Any violation of this act or of the regulations lawfully promulgated thereunder shall be deemed a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $300 or by imprisonment for not more than 90 days.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia is hereby directed to require all owners operating, controlling, managing, or renting any passenger motor vehicles for hire in the District of Columbia, except as to operations licensed under paragraph 31 (b) of the act approved July 1, 1932, known as the 'License Act', and except such common carriers as have been expressly exempted from the jurisdiction of the Commission, to file with the Commission for each motor vehicle to be operated a bond or bonds, policy or policies, of liability insurance conditioned for the payment of any judgment recovered against such owner or his agent, lessee, employee, or renter, for death or for injury to any person or damage to any property, or both, caused in the operation, maintenance, use, or by reason of the defective construction of such vehicle. Any such bond or undertaking or policy of liability insurance shall be in such form and on such terms and/or conditions as the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia may direct: Provided, That such bond or policy may limit the liability of the surety or insurer on any one judgment to $2,500 for bodily injuries or death and $500 for damage to or destruction of property, and all judgments recovered upon claims arising out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action to $5,000 for bodily injuries or death and $1,000 for damages to or destruction of property, to be apportioned ratably among the judgment creditors according to the amount of their respective judgments: Provided, however, That such bond or bonds, or policy or policies, of insurance shall contain a provision for a continuing liability thereunder notwithstanding any recovery thereon.

"SEC. 2. That the bond or bonds, policy or policies, of insurance required by this act shall be issued only by such company or companies as shall be certified to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia by the Superintendent of Insurance of the District of Columbia as hereinafter provided, except the superintendent of insurance shall not certify to the Public Utilities Commission that a company issuing insurance policies or surety bonds under the provisions of this act is responsible, unless such company or companies shall have and maintain at all times, in addition to the reserve provided by law, an unimpaired capital, if a stock company, of $100,000, except that if such stock company is engaged in doing business solely within the District of Columbia said unimpaired capital shall be not less than $50,000; and if a mutual company, a surplus to the policyholders of not less than $100,000, except that if such mutual company is engaged in doing business solely within the District of Columbia said surplus to policyholders shall be not less than $20,000: Provided, That such company or companies shall be subject to the approval of the Public Utilities Commission.

"SEC. 3. If, after the issuance of a certificate it shall appear to the said Superintendent that any company or companies are no longer trustworthy or financially capable of meeting their obligations he shall withdraw from the Public Utilities Commission the certificate theretofore issued by him and in such event the company or companies shall immediately cease to write any further bond or bonds, or policy or policies, of insurance under this act: Provided, That the Commission, for the same reasons and after 20 days' notice to an owner, may withdraw its approval, and such owner shall cease to operate or cause to be operated the vehicles insured under such policy or bond until he has complied with the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 4. No bond or policy of insurance written pursuant to the terms of this act shall be canceled or terminated by any insurance or surety company unless not less than 5 days prior to such termination or cancelation notice of intention so to do has been filed in writing with the Commission.

"SEC. 5. It shall be unlawful to operate any vehicle subject to the provisions of this act unless such vehicle shall be covered by an approved bond or policy of liability insurance as provided herein. The Commission shall have the power to make all reasonable rules and regulations which, in its opinion, are necessary to make effective the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 6. Any violation of this act or of the regulations lawfully promulgated thereunder shall be deemed a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $300 or by imprisonment for not more than 90 days.

"SEC. 7. This act shall take effect October 1, 1934."

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be heard on this bill, and the gentleman from Maryland has agreed to divide the time.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] to dispose of as he sees fit.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to protect the pedestrians and the public. Throughout the country we have found that taxicab drivers—individual drivers—are in many cases irresponsible, and whenever they have an accident the injured person is unable to receive any benefit to pay expenses incurred by virtue of the accident received, although the taxicab driver is in fault.

We have just passed a bill compelling private individuals who use cars, much less than taxicab drivers, to obtain insurance against accident. Taxicabs run all day long, and in most instances when they have a passenger violate the speed laws, and it stands to reason that they ought to protect the public against accident.

This is giving them a little more rights than the ordinary liability insurance that most Members of the House obtain for themselves. The usual liability is $5,000 to $10,000. This only compels the individual taxicab driver to insure for $2,500 and $5,000. I cannot see why there should be any objection to the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does this bill requiring the taxicab driver to take out insurance have the same exception that the first bill that we passed had?

Mr. PALMISANO. No.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. The report says that this will cause the taxicab company to pay $75,000 next year for insurance. Will that raise the price that they charge for hire?

Mr. PALMISANO. Well, I suppose it might raise it a nickel.

Mr. GLOVER. Would it not affect the price now charged by taxicabs so that it will be much higher for passengers?

Mr. PALMISANO. It may be 5 cents higher. I may say that in Maryland they have not only passed a law compelling insurance, which places an additional burden on the private taxicab driver, but in that case they drive 3½ miles for 25 cents.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. There were two bills relating to automobile insurance here on this calendar. We have passed one which grants much protection. My colleague, Mr. PATMAN, has serious objection to this bill for several reasons; why insist on passing this one now?

Mr. PALMISANO. We had no other bill here. The people of the District seem to want this bill, and we ought to pass it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the attitude of the taxicab drivers themselves, these young men who are making a fair living, working day and night to make a living for their families? Are they not all opposed to this proposition and will it not work an undue and unjust hardship on them at this time?

Mr. PALMISANO. I personally do not think so. My colleague on the committee is more familiar with the bill and he may answer the question further.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. I attended all the meetings of the committee. We had extensive hearings in which all the different elements of the taxicab business appeared before the committee. About 99 percent of the legitimate taxicab organizations, whether they were independents or associations, were for the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The organizations to which the gentleman refers are the owners of the cabs, are they not?

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. We had one man by the name of Hines who is a veteran. The statement has been made that there are a great many veterans operating taxicabs and thereby making a livelihood. One of the principal persons representing them appeared before the committee; the man I have just referred to, by the name of Hines, who has four or five taxicabs. He was in favor of the bill. He has come to me outside of the committee three or four times and thanked me for my interest in this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have had three or four of these boys who drive taxicabs talk to me about this matter, and they are deeply interested. From the figures cited to me, it would be a great hardship on them, in view of the terrible time they have to eke out a living at this time. I should certainly like to hear some pressing, imperious necessity for the passage of this bill.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. The necessity for the passage of this bill is that you have constitutents coming here and I have constituents coming here who ride these taxicabs. Those people constitute the main occupants of these cabs. With this city crowded with all kinds of rattletrap taxicabs a menace is constituted in this town. If there are a few of these taxicabs put out of business, it is justified by the safety to the public, and we owe that duty to your constituents and my constituents and the constituents who come here from all over the United States. There may be a few of these rattletrap taxicabs run off the streets. The condition which the gentleman from Alabama states prevails all over the country, and yet we have the protection of the people involved.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Until 5 years ago there was the biggest monopoly in the world of the taxicab business in Washington. There was what was known as the "Black and White" and the "Yellow", and one other company, which absolutely controlled all of the taxicab business in this city, and it was almost impossible to get service. We get better service now for 20 cents than we got then for $1.

It is the poor people of Washington who use taxicabs. Many have no other means of reaching work. It is the people who draw salaries of $1,200, $1,500, $1,800, and $2,500 who use the taxicabs of Washington. They now have the best service and the most reasonable service they have ever had. We have been fighting for years to stop the monopoly.

There is one monopoly which still exists, and which the committee ought to break up before we adjourn, and that is the monopoly over here at Union Station which allows one company to put all of its taxicabs in on the first runway, and if anyone wants to go to the station in another taxi or their own vehicle, they have to get out on the second or third runway and pass through all these lined-up monopolistic taxicabs and take a chance on getting run over to get into the Union Station. That is a monopoly that the committee ought to stop. If I were a member of that committee I would not go to sleep at night until I took steps to get a bill reported to stop that infamous monopoly. There ought to be an equal chance to all vehicles over at that depot, in the Nation's Capital. This Government spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in helping to establish that Union Station and helping to construct it.

It is outrageous to have one taxicab company occupy the inside track and get all the taxicab business at Union Station.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that I agree with him on that proposition, but that is not up for consideration now.

Mr. BLANTON. Why is it not before your committee?

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Wait until I get through. The proposition we have is that some of your constituents or members of your family would have to go through that place which you just said was dangerous and run the risk of being injured by the taxicabs, and then not be able to get anything out of it for the injury.

Mr. BLANTON. If you pass this bill you run off of the streets of Washington 500 taxicabs, at least. At least 500 young men with families, a wife and two or three little children, are now making a living, and I have talked to many of them. Many of them are men who went to France. If you pass this bill which is now pending you will run off the streets of Washington at least 500 of those cabs and keep 500 heads of families from making an honest living.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Well, is that more important than that the people be able to receive something for their injuries?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not heard of many of them being injured.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Oh, there are lots of them. In the bankruptcy court there are 184 unpaid claims growing out of taxicab accidents in which only one taxicab company is involved.

Mr. BLANTON. I think we have some of the finest taxicab drivers in the world right here in Washington.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman will not contend there was any such evidence presented before the committee?

Mr. PALMISANO. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up all the time——

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Will this add a cost of $35 a year for each of these taxicab drivers for a bond?

Mr. PALMISANO. I am not just sure what the cost will be. Of course there will be some cost. In answer to that I may say that in order to protect the public we are compelling and we just passed a bill which provides that you and I must have insurance in case we have an accident.

If you provide it for the individual, it seems to me it ought to be more important that a common carrier should have insurance in order to comply with the old common-law rule that they are responsible whenever a passenger is hurt in their car.

They certainly ought to be in a position to pay something.

Mr. DONDERO. Would they not have to charge higher rates for their service?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. The minority report states that it will cost from $30 to $35 a month, instead of a year, for this insurance.

Mr. DONDERO. I think it will be considerably lower.

Mr. HASTINGS. This is an important consideration. What is the estimated cost per single taxicab per month for $2,500 of insurance?

Mr. TRUAX. It is very high, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. PALMISANO. I am not certain as to the cost. It may be of interest to the gentleman to learn about the taxicab situation in Baltimore. I have fought against meters in the District of Columbia because I think they add an unnecessary expense. In Baltimore they compel the taxicabs to put on meters and to carry $5,000 and $10,000 insurance. The taxi rate in Baltimore is 25 cents for the first 3½ miles. In my estimation that rate provides a longer ride for 20 cents than one gets in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HASTINGS. Was any testimony taken before the committee showing what the cost of this insurance would be for a single taxicab?

Mr. O'CONNOR. In the city of New York a $5,000 insurance policy costs $28 a month for each cab.

Mr. TRUAX. The rate would be the same here.

Mr. PALMISANO. Then for $2,500 the premium would be $14 per month.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO, I yield.

Mr. FORD. Does the gentleman seriously think that any man who pays 20 cents to ride in a taxicab is entitled to the protection of insurance?

Mr. PALMISANO. How about the pedestrian?

Mr. FORD. That is another matter. I hope the gentleman will answer my first question.

Mr. PALMISANO. The man who pays 7½ cents to ride on a street car can collect damages in case he is injured in an accident in which the street car is involved. By the same token a man who pays 20 cents to ride in a public vehicle should have the same kind of protection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. GLOVER. As I understand, there are four large insurance companies in Washington that will write this insurance. There is no provision in the bill which fixes the rate they can charge for the insurance. They can get together and fix any rate they wish, with the sky the limit.

The House has just passed another insurance bill relating to the drivers of all vehicles. That bill covers the situation we are now discussing. As I see it, the former bill obviates the necessity of passing legislation of the kind we are now considering. If this bill is passed it will throw out of employment hundreds of people and turn them over to the public to be fed. Is not that true?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes; but under the liability bill it will be necessary to have $5,000 and $10,000 after an accident where, by the present bill, we are seeking to make it a little easier for the taxicab drivers by requiring that they carry only $2,500 of insurance.

Mr. GLOVER. Did I not understand the gentleman a moment ago to state that there would be a meter system evolved?

Mr. PALMISANO. No, the gentleman must have misunderstood me, for I said that I have consistently fought the meter system.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. I wonder if these 4 big insurance companies have any connection with the 5 big insurance companies for which in the early days of the last session we appropriated $50,000,000 to keep them functioning when they were practically broke.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not know anything about the companies which will write this insurance.

Mr. TRUAX. I thank the gentleman for his statement. I want to call attention to what I consider one of the greatest taxicab evils in Washington; that is the evil of cruising in fleets around the corners of streets. It frequently happens that when pedestrians try to cross streets as many as 15 cabs will swing around the corner, one after the other, in a fleet. We should do something to stop this cruising around corners; it should be regulated in some way.

In my judgment this bill will penalize the little fellow, as has been said, to the advantage of the monopolies and the organized taxicab companies.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I wish to call attention to a case which happened yesterday. A lady paid 20 cents to go to a certain point and then had to pay 80 cents to return. Does not the gentleman think it would be more desirable to legislate uniform rates in the District than it would be to pass legislation, the effect of which will be to put a great many taxicab drivers out of business?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the lady should not have paid him, but should have called the police department and had them come and take charge of that driver, for such discrimination in rates is outrageous. The people should not be held up.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I think the gentleman misunderstands the situation. The lady took a 20-cent cab to go to the place, in the first instance, but was so unfortunate as to hail a meter cab for the return trip. I feel that there should be a uniform scale of taxicab rates in this city.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman in that respect; but the bill under consideration is another proposition. If it is passed, the poor people here who now ride for 20 cents will have to pay 50 or 75 cents.

Mr. PALMISANO. The law requires that the rates be posted in the cars.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes; but a person can never see them or understand them.

Mr. PALMISANO. The meter rates are different from the zone rates. The other day I got into a meter taxicab to go to the station, and it cost me 35 cents instead of 20 cents.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I contend that we should eliminate the meter system.

Mr. PALMISANO. The bill under consideration does not deal with rates.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think the approach of this taxicab matter is from the standpoint either of the one who wants to get cheap fares or from the standpoint of one who wants to ride in a cab and be protected in case of accident. There is no question but what it is going to cost the cabbies $25 or $30 a month to carry the insurance, just as intimated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR]. Obviously the cabby is going to have to pass this additional expense on to the people. He has to get it from somewhere, and certainly the taxi fares are going up. I do not know how much they will go up, and I do not believe anyone knows. They may go up to 30 cents, or perhaps only to a quarter.

If you prefer to carry your own insurance, very well and good, then you may very well oppose this bill. However, if you feel there ought to be some measure of responsibility put upon the shoulders of these taxi drivers in the event of an accident wherein personal or property damage may result and if you feel that the taxi driver should be financially responsible either by bond or through property or otherwise whereby a judgment might be collected, you should vote for this bill.

It is one thing to look at this very dispassionately, never having been in a taxicab accident, and it is another thing to go on year in and year out without an accident, and think only of the taxicab fare. If you want to carry your own insurance and if you want everyone who rides in taxicabs to carry his own insurance, I would suggest voting down this bill and pay your 20 cents day after day. However, if you are going down Pennsylvania Avenue in a cab and have a wreck at Ninth and Pennsylvania Avenue and go to the hospital and come out of the hospital with a $500 doctor and hospital bill, just shake hands with yourself and say that this was paid for in savings in cab fares. On the other hand, if you have had an accident, if you are thinking about the people who have had accidents or those who by the law of probability are going to have accidents, then I think the thing to do is to vote for this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Just providing for insurance is not going to bring the millennium, because after you get insurance even in some of the big companies and you have an accident, those companies have the finest and the shrewdest legal talent in the world hired by the year, and they will go into court and beat you out of it, if they can.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Would not that be true in the gentleman's State as well as in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, of course. I think the the first bill which we have already passed, has provided reasonable assurance of protection to the people and I think the second bill ought not to be passed.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. How about the poor fellow who has the first accident?

Mr. BLANTON. It is not necessary to have an accident for a taxi driver to be negligent, and be forced to carry insurance under the bill we have passed. Every time one of these negligent taxicab drivers has defective brakes, or cuts one of these corners short, or speeds in congested districts, he is guilty of negligence and when a policeman catches him or somebody else reports him, he should be suspended, and he can then be forced to take out insurance under the bill we have just passed. He does not have to have an accident to be negligent. Why, a man may drive 20 miles an hour and be more careless and negligent than when driving 60 miles an hour in some other locality. There are places where a man should not drive over 10 miles an hour to keep from being negligent.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I conclude my statement by saying that there is no mystery about this bill. All it asks is that the taxicab drivers furnish a bond in a certain amount. Then it provides for the regulations under which the so-called "mutual," or stock companies shall operate, including the amount of reserve, and so forth.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill forces all of them to get a license, and there is where the monopoly comes in, for many of the independents cannot pay the required cash. The monopoly will come in and stop them from getting licenses.

Mr. DIRKSEN. This bill covers the amount of reserve and the amount of capital that these so-called "mutual insurance companies" shall carry. The insurance companies will operate under the regulations and under the supervision of the Superintendent of Insurance. That is all there is under this bill. The only question to be decided here is whether you are going to carry your own insurance and continue to pay 20 cents in the first zone, or protect all people who are riding in cabs by providing taxicab operators who are financially responsible through the instrumentality of a bond.

That is all there is to this bill. There is nothing mysterious or complex about it, and there is not a State in the Union that does not compel some kind of insurance in these cases.

Mr. TRUAX. Why not take out insurance on the pedestrians?

Mr. DIRKSEN. These people serve in the capacity of common carriers and hold themselves out for hire by everybody. They are public servants in this respect.

Mr. DONDERO. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he thinks insurance is going to make the taxicab drivers less negligent?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not know about that. Human nature will always operate in the District of Columbia as well as in Ohio or Texas or Illinois.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I believe the interests of the people will be adequately protected by those present, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

TAXICAB LIABILITY INSURANCE

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago we passed a bill that will require all operators of motor vehicles, whether they are cab drivers or individual owners, to carry liability insurance after they have been guilty of an act of carelessness, negligence, or a violation of law for which their permit to drive might be taken away from them in Washington, D.C. This law says that if any person drives while under the influence of liquor or narcotic drugs, or if he leaves the scene of an accident when he should not leave, or is guilty of such other violations as constitute cause for suspension or revocation of license in the District of Columbia, or has been convicted of an offense in another State which if committed in the District of Columbia would be a violation of any of the aforesaid provisions of the traffic act of the District of Columbia, he shall not be permitted to operate an automobile in the District until he takes out liability insurance with a reputable company.

This applies not only to individual owners but to taxicab owners as well, and we have in Washington, D.C., drivers who have been driving here for 15 years, making a living for themselves and their families, who have never been accused of an offense of any kind. No act of negligence or carelessness has ever been charged against them.

Do you not think this is a pretty good record for the taxicab drivers? We have fewer taxicab accidents than any city of this size in America. The reason is the taxicab operator has something to lose if he violates the law. He has a very valuable permit. This is his asset and the only asset he has on earth. This is his business and trade. This is the way he makes a living—by possessing the privilege of driving a taxicab upon the streets of the District of Columbia. If he loses this permit it is the same to him as if a business man lost his place of business or a man lost his home or anyone who made an investment losing such investment, representing the savings of a lifetime. This is exactly what such a taxicab driver loses. He loses everything he has on earth if he violates the law of the District of Columbia. This is the reason you do not have many taxicab accidents here. You have careful drivers because they have something to lose if they violate the law.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, should not be designated as a safety bill. I know that one of the greatest lobbies in America today is the insurance lobby. They do not operate openly and aboveboard. They operate somewhat in sheep's clothing. They go around under the name of safety organizations for the protection of the public. They are always talking safety and protection—save the little children, save the old people. You see their placards all over the country. They are doing this to sell the country the theory that all kinds of insurance laws should be passed which will enable them to receive enormous premiums for writing this insurance.

If they are really honest and sincere in their desire to protect the people who use taxicabs on the streets of the District of Columbia from loss by reason of property damage or personal injury, why do they not write into this bill the provision that they shall be fully covered. No; the insurance company would not write that kind of business. They just want enough safety in the law so they will get the business. The limit of the liability under this bill will be $2,500 for personal injury. This will be the limit. Why do they not make it more? They are going to get everything that the cab owner can afford to pay, anyway, for insurance under the $2,500 liability, and they could not pay the insurance if it were more. They just want enough safety so they will get the premiums they want and all the owners can pay. If there were a judgment of $20,000 against them, the cab company would still have to pay the $17,500. If there were a judgment of $1,000 for property damage, the cab company would still have to pay $500 of that, because the insurance company has a very limited liability, but sufficiently broad to enable them to collect $1,500,000 more from the taxicab operators in this District every year, if you pass this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Just for a brief question, because I have very limited time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman know that every company in New York City that has made a specialty of insuring taxicabs at $28 a month has made a failure of it and is in liquidation? This is how profitable it is.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman is right. In New York there is one fleet of cabs that cannot get insurance.

Mr. BLANTON. They go broke because they pay their presidents from $100,000 to $200,000 a year as salary.

Mr. PATMAN. Whenever you require them to take insurance to give full protection, it means the insurance companies go broke instead of the taxicab companies, and under this bill there will be $1,500,000 a year added in Washington to the cost of using taxicabs.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mrs. KAHN. Has the gentleman any idea how much this insurance would cost a taxi driver today?

Mr. PATMAN. I think a reasonable estimate would be that the insurance would cost the taxi driver between $25 and $40 a month. In Baltimore it costs $35 a month.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Will the effect of this legislation be to take the schoolboys who operate taxicabs off the streets?

Mr. PATMAN. They cannot operate them now. The taxicab operators in Washington have to stand a very rigid examination. This bill, if it is enacted into law today, will put off the streets tomorrow more than 1,000 independent operators, men who own their own cabs, or maybe have two or three cabs and have their neighbors or relatives driving for them. They will be put off the streets. One of the objects of the law is to create a monopoly of taxicabs in Washington.

The first object, I believe, is to help the insurance companies. This will cause them to make a lot of money and is one of the first objects. This is not the object of all the sponsors of the legislation. I do not mean to impugn the motives of any person who is sponsoring this bill, but some of those who are sponsoring it, I think, are doing so with the hope and expectation they will make money out of it. I am not referring to Members of Congress but to those who are advocating the legislation.

In their order I would say, first, the insurance companies; next, the street cars and busses want it passed, because they want this competition out of the way. While they are taking the cabs off the streets, they are putting more street cars and busses on the streets. I know there are a lot of good people who argue that it is unfair competition. This was argued to me as a member of the committee, and it was stated that we should stand for this legislation because it is unfair to the street-car companies and the bus companies to have to meet this kind of competition.

If you make them carry that insurance it will take off at least one-quarter of the taxicabs and the people will have to use the street cars or the busses, for they cannot find a parking place.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. For a brief question.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman stated that the rate would be thirty or forty dollars a month. That seems to be rather high. Has the gentleman any figures from a comparable city?

Mr. PATMAN. I do not think there is any dispute about it. They claim that they will start off with a charge of $20 a month. But there is no limit to the amount they can charge the next day. The sky will be the limit on insurance rates. There will be no power in the District of Columbia or in the United States to reduce those rates. They can charge any amount they see fit. There is no power in the District of Columbia to prevent them doubling the rates. They can charge 40 cents to the Union Station instead of 20 cents to the Union Station, or they can charge a dollar. Of course, they claim they will be fair, but this business will all get into the hands of three or four companies, and it will be a monopoly. If you are willing to trust a monopoly with the cab rates and the insurance rates, you vote for this bill, because by your vote you will say that you have the utmost faith in a monopoly operating in the public interest.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. If they make the insurance compulsory, they should make it available at the lowest possible rate.

Mr. PATMAN. Under this bill—this is a very important matter and is going to affect everyone, your constituents as well as mine—this bill is so artfully written that at first you would not see it. It is so artfully written that you will not at first detect it. There is the Diamond Cab, the Bell Cab Co., and one or two other companies who will carry their insurance under their regular business at $5 a month, but the independents will have to go to the insurance companies and pay $25 or $30 a month. Now, you cannot operate in competition with a fleet where they only pay $5 a month and the individual taxicab owner has to pay $30 or $40 a month.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; briefly.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Could not the independent operators get their insurance through mutual companies?

Mr. PATMAN. Under this bill, if they belong to a fleet, they can carry their own insurance, and the big companies will do that; but remember that the law requires the independent owner to pay two insurance premiums that the big companies do not have to pay. They will have to carry another insurance in order to take care of the excess judgments, because there will be a lot of excess judgments when they are followed by a lot of ambulance chasers.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman said that Members of Congress and their constituents from the States are very much interested.

In addition to that, there are 70,000 Government employees here who are vitally interested. They use the taxicabs. Then there are about 40,000 clerks in town, with moderate salaries, who work for commercial concerns who are vitally interested. They all use taxicabs and need low rates. I am thinking of those people.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. One of the strongest arguments which the gentleman has made against this bill is the chiseling insurance companies. After you have an accident you are lucky if you get 20 percent of the amount you are entitled to, so they take it away from you both coming and going.

Mr. PATMAN. In reply to the gentleman, as conditions exist now, there is one company that is out $7,500 a year on claims. They have paid all claims or satisfactorily adjusted them for $7,500 a year. Under this bill they will have to pay $75,000 a year just for premiums alone, and that will include very limited liability, $500 property damage, and $2,500 personal injury.

Therefore, the cost to the taxicab users in Washington will be $1,500,000 more than they had to pay last year, and who will get the benefit of that? These frivilous fraudulent claims and lawsuits and ambulance-chasing lawyers will get it and the insurance companies. That is who will get it. In other words, we will have to pay $10 in the future for the same protection we have been getting in the past for $1, and the lawyer gets half of that; so the public will be out $20 for every $1 that the injured person will get.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I wish to make an observation. In my own city some years ago they had what was known as "jitney" cars. A man or woman could get into a car for a nickel. Those people were driven out of business just as soon as the city council passed a law requiring insurance. Has the gentleman gone into the question of how many of these independent taxicab drivers will be retired in the District and go out of business if this bill is passed?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes. There will be 1,000 families that will need relief very soon. If you pass this bill, you should make some provision to take care of those thousand families that will be needy, whose husbands and fathers are now making a living for them with taxicabs on the streets of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman just mentioned the thousands who are in need. I have been watching the progress of the Committee on the District of Columbia on the different days set aside for them, and with thousands and thousands of old people——

Mr. PATMAN. Now, I just yield for a question about this bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Well, why does not the gentleman bring in the only real bill which the District of Columbia is interested in—the old-age pension bill?

Mr. PATMAN. We have the bill before the House, and it will be considered.

Mr. CONNERY. Not today. That is a bill which the entire District of Columbia is interested in, and that should be taken up and considered and not these little things outside the District of Columbia.

Mr. PATMAN. We cannot cover the entire District of Columbia in this discussion. We only have a very limited time. I appreciate what the gentleman says, and I am in favor of old-age pensions, but we cannot discuss it here now.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. If this bill passes, then the District of Columbia cabs will be allowed to go into Maryland. If it does not pass, the Maryland cabs can still come into the District of Columbia.

Mr. PATMAN. Now, the gentleman is mistaken about it, I think. If not, I will say that that is a question that was not even raised before the committee, and I sat there 2 or 3 days listening to every witness. Furthermore, I challenged all of them there to name a serious accident where the unfortunate victim was unable to collect damages. One of the lawyers finally called one man by name where an accident happened at Dupont Circle. I looked into it and found it was a Maryland cab that caused the accident, and he would not have come under this law in any event. There are fewer claims than most any place in America I know of.

Mr. GOSS. Residents who live over the line in Chevy Chase, for instance, cannot go home in a taxicab today.

Mr. PATMAN. Well, that is a very poor excuse for passing this bill.

Mr. GOSS. I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. PATMAN. To make people pay a million and a half dollars extra just to let a few people ride a few blocks outside of the District of Columbia I do not think is justified.

They can cross the District line. Not many of them will pay taxicab fare from downtown Washington into Maryland anyway.

Mr. GOSS. There is nothing in this bill that has anything to do with Maryland at all.

Mr. PATMAN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GOSS. I understood it was a question of insurance in Maryland.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Who is it who has appeared in Congress advocating this bill? Who was it who appeared before the committee and showed the most interest?

Mr. PATMAN. The safety organizations had representation there. Of course, a part of their funds are contributed by the insurance companies. There are many conscientious people who want this done. Of course, the street-car companies and the bus companies would like to have it done, although they were not visibly in evidence throughout the hearings, but I think you can find the footprints of their activities around because it would be a great benefit to them.

Let me tell you where this money would go. I have told you it would cost the public $10 in insurance premiums alone to every $1 the injured person and his lawyer will receive. That is not counting excess liability. Will the insurance companies get that difference? No; they will not get nearly all of it. When you pass a law like this you encourage every kind of a little, frivilous claim. They say, "Oh, it is insured." The cab owners and drivers in many cases will take the side of their passengers and help them get money out of the insurance company. I do not mean they would swear to a lie, but they are not very active and enthusiastic against the insurance companies, because they pay for the insurance. You will have every kind of a little claim imaginable. There will be a multiplicity of lawsuits. The difference will go to ambulance-chasing lawyers and people making fraudulent claims and to some people who have good claims, but most of those will get adjustments in any event.

Mr. MAY. As I understand it, the insurance feature is the important feature of the bill. Those companies owning large fleets of cabs are enabled by small deductions from their gross receipts to obtain what is sometimes called "group policies" and thus carry insurance on all their cars.

Mr. PATMAN. In effect that is true.

Mr. MAY. The smaller man, however, the individual taxicab driver, cannot get one of these cheap group policies but is forced to pay a premium amounting to about $30 a month.

Mr. PATMAN. That is right. Under this bill the large operators are protected; they do not need to pay large insurance premiums. If they are able to satisfy judgments against them, it will cost them no more in the future than it has in the past. Frequently the large companies are self-insurers.

So far as obtaining settlements from insurance companies is concerned, remember that the insurance companies have had a hundred years more experience in the matter of handling litigants and keeping them out of the courts of justice than any of the taxicab owners have had; and one will have just as much trouble getting a claim adjusted by an insurance company as he would have in collecting from the cab company—in most instances; I will not say all instances.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. The gentleman just stated that the cab drivers would join the passengers in an effort to fleece the insurance companies through fictitious claims.

Mr. PATMAN. No; I did not make that charge.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I am sure the gentleman carries insurance on his splendid automobile. Ought not the gentleman grant the same measure of honesty to the taxicab drivers that he claims for himself?

Mr. PATMAN. It so happens that I do not and have not carried liability insurance for many years, and I am not going to in the future. If one should try to provide by insurance against everything that might happen, the insurance companies will get all he can earn.

Mr. MAY. And the gentleman has been careful?

Mr. PATMAN. I have been careful.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. But could the gentleman pay a judgment arising out of an automobile accident were a judgment returned against him?

Mr. PATMAN. I certainly would take care of a reasonable judgment, but I am not going to have to pay a judgment, because I am a careful driver; and if a person is a careful driver, he can rest easy. If you happen to have an accident, that is unfortunate; you cannot control it; and you ought not to pay for it, anyway.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Then the gentleman thinks there is no such thing as an accident?

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, yes, there are accidents; and if I should happen to have an accident, by not carrying insurance I have saved enough money to pay for quite a considerable loss. I carry life insurance and other insurance, but not automobile liability insurance.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. The gentleman believes that instead of spending money for insurance that it is better to spend it for flowers to take to a funeral?

Mr. PATMAN. Of course, the gentleman has the right to make facetious arguments if he wants to. That is just about as good as any argument he has ever made for this bill; that is one of the strongest arguments I have heard for this bill, just such arguments as that; they cannot support the bill by logic and reason, for they have no logic and reason to support the compulsory payment of insurance premiums.

Pass this bill and the insurance companies will call you a great statesman, because it will mean many hundreds of thousands of dollars to the insurance company in the way of premiums. I would not be surprised either if the directors of the street-car companies called you a great statesman if you pass this bill. The Power Trust will also be pleased with your vote.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. Does the gentleman not frequently ride in taxicabs in the District of Columbia?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; I ride in taxicabs here.

Mr. PALMISANO. Does not the gentleman know that taxicab drivers violate the speed laws even while they have him as a passenger?

Mr. PATMAN. Well, if they violate the law and they are careless or negligent, or even if they violate the speed law, then, under the bill the House has just passed, they will be required to carry insurance. So why penalize efficiency? Why penalize the careful driver? Why not put a premium on them instead of trying to penalize them? That is what you are doing in this bill. Under the bill we have just passed, if the drivers are negligent, they can be penalized. A driver of 15 years' experience who has had no accident should not be penalized; we should not take this money away from their wives and children and give it to the insurance companies, the street-car companies, the bus companies, and the ambulance-chasing lawyers.

Mr. TRUAX. The Power Trust, too, for they furnish the power to operate the street cars.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. As a proposition of general law, if a person involved in an accident is not guilty of negligence, no liability attaches to him.

Mr. PATMAN. No; they would not be liable anyway if they were not guilty of negligence.

The gentleman spoke of rattletrap cabs. That is not an argument for this bill. If there are rattletrap cabs, and the gentleman knows of them, it is his duty to report them to the director of traffic and they will be taken off the streets, for there are certain definite requirements with regard to the vehicles used as taxicabs. Their brakes must be in good condition and they must be good vehicles generally and must not be a source of danger to the public. This is the present law; and if the gentleman did not know it before, I am telling it to him now. If the gentleman knows of any cabs such as he spoke of just a moment ago, it is his duty as a law-abiding citizen, as a law-enforcing citizen, as well as a law-making citizen, to report that fact to the director of traffic and he will immediately take that vehicle off the streets. So that argument is no better than the flower argument.

Mr. TERRY of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. TERRY of Arkansas. I should like to know, as a matter of information, who establishes the rates the taxicabs now charge.

Mr. PATMAN. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that matter. I explained that a while ago; but since the gentleman did not catch it, I will explain it over again for fear others may not have caught it.

If this bill becomes a law, no one else on earth except the cab owners will set the rate. If they set the rate 100, 200, or 500 percent more, the gentleman cannot object. He will have no one to object to, and there will be no one in the District that can change the rates. The rates will remain in effect, and no power on earth will be able to change them. The sky will be the limit.

Mr. TERRY of Arkansas. Who established the 20-cent, 30-cent, 50-cent, and 70-cent rate that they now operate under?

Mr. PATMAN. The independent owners of this city are the ones responsible. Competition set those rates. Whenever you take the independents away, the real competition, you will put the high rates back into effect. Do not allow yourselves to believe that these taxicab owners are starving to death. They are making good money in Washington. One operator told me that, of course, there are drivers who go out and work Saturdays and Sundays and make enough money to last a few days and then lay off. There are cases like that, but they are not all that way. The operators of cabs here are pretty good men. They are safe and careful drivers, and they are supporting their families. If you pass this bill, you will put a thousand of them on the relief rolls of the city.

Mr. TERRY of Arkansas. If there are certain rates established now, and if they have liability insurance, could not the same people raise the rates sufficiently to take care of the premium which the taxicab drivers have to pay?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; they can do that, but the sky will be the limit. There will be two limits over which you will have no control. You may say to the cab owners: "Why charge 50 and 75 cents for taking me to the Union Station when you used to take me there for 20 or 30 cents?" They will say: "Well, we have to pay two insurance premiums, one to the insurance company of over $1 a day." In a lot of the cities it is $1 a day or more, and it will probably be at least that here. You might say: "Why do you not get the rates lowered?" They will say: "We cannot. That is left up to the insurance companies to set the insurance rates." It will be left to the cab owners to set the cab rates. So there are two places that the sky will be the limit and the users of the taxicabs will be paying the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The 20-cent taxicab rate has forced the street cars to put on what they call their "$1-a-week ticket." If we pass this bill and let the taxicab rates go up, you will see the $1 rate taken off by the street-car company, and then we will be at the mercy of the operators of Washington.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Permission having been granted, I insert herewith a copy of the minority report filed by me on this bill:

MINORITY VIEWS

The title of this act should read "An act to compel more of the people of Washington to use street cars and busses instead of taxicabs; to further aid and assist insurance companies; to encourage ambulance-chasing lawyers, and to create a cab monopoly in the city of Washington."

This bill is not endorsed by all the members of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Two have endorsed it, but one has entered a protest against its passage.

As chairman of the subcommittee that held hearings on this measure for several days, and after we had obtained all the facts it was possible for us to obtain, I am opposed to the measure for the following reasons:

NO EVIL SHOWN JUSTIFYING LAW'S PASSAGE

First. Before any law is enacted, an evil should be shown that will be corrected by its passage. There are about 4,000 cabs operating in Washington. Most of them are in a position to pay any deserving claim at this time. This law would merely cause the injured person to collect from the insurance company that was insuring the cab instead of cab owners. It is true that there are accidents growing out of the operation of cabs, but the testimony before the subcommittee failed to disclose a single instance where any person had been injured or had his property injured, and had been unable to collect damages from the owner of the cab causing it. It must be remembered that the public is now reasonably well protected against loss by reason of negligent operation of cab drivers in Washington.

Therefore, the evil that this law seeks to correct has not been shown sufficiently to justify the passage of this act.

INCREASE COST 10 TIMES

Second. The testimony before the subcommittee discloses that one particular fleet of 300 cabs in the city of Washington in the past years satisfactorily settled all claims. A complete record has been kept, and is available for inspection. It cost this company approximately $7,500 annually to settle these claims. If this law is passed, that same company will pay $75,000 next year for insurance that will only partially cover their losses. Similar facts were presented for other taxicab companies.

ADDITIONAL COST OF $1,500,000 ANNUALLY

I estimate that it will cost the taxi users of the city of Washington an additional million and five hundred thousand dollars the next year if this bill is passed. The insurance premiums on partial coverage will amount to approximately $1,600,000. Without this law, $100,000 will be sufficient to pay all losses, presuming that the losses the next year will not be any greater than an average over a period of several years in the past. Therefore the additional cost will be $1,500,000 annually for this very limited protection.

WILL GRANT CAB MONOPOLY

Third. This bill will grant a cab monopoly. When it is obtained the owners of the street cars and bus companies will probably purchase it either directly or indirectly. It grants a substantial concession to large cab owners. Under the terms of this bill, a cab company in this city that is now operating 1,000 cabs will be able to carry its own insurance for $5.50 a month, presuming its losses will not be any greater than they have been in the past.

UNEMPLOYMENT WILL BE CAUSED

An independent operator in order to secure the same protection will be required to pay $30 or $35 a month, more likely $35 for this very limited protection. This will place the independent operator at a distinct disadvantage and drive him out of business. There are approximately 1,000 independent operators of taxicabs in the District today. They are making a good living for themselves and families. If this law passes, which cannot be construed by any stretch of the imagination as intending to help more than 100 people, the next year it will place on the charity rolls many of the thousand families of these operators. In fact, it has been suggested that this bill should contain another provision providing for the relief of former cab drivers.

PUBLIC PROTECTED NOW

Fourth. This law is sought by many public-spirited citizens. They are unselfish and patriotic. In racking their brains for plans and ideas in order that they may advocate changes in the existing order of things, they have conscientiously decided that all cab operators should be required to carry additional insurance for the protection of the public. I am afraid they have ignored the fact that the public is already protected in most instances, and the few instances wherein the public is not protected, are not sufficient to justify the million-and-a-half-dollar additional expense to the cab users in Washington over a period of 1 year, and the placing in the bread lines of approximately 1,000 cab owners and their families.

$20 PAID BY CAB USERS TO EVERY $1 TO INJURED PERSON

Fifth: It is said that many civic groups of the city desire this legislation. I do not charge that such groups were dictated to by people who have their own interest in mind, but it would be interesting to know just how many of the people in these groups were interested either as owners of stock or employees in the street car and bus companies; the insurance companies and the special-favored cabs. It should also be considered that this law will be a source of big business for many lawyers in Washington. The cab users will pay $10 insurance under this bill to every $1 they would have to pay without it. About one-half of that $1 goes to the lawyers and courts. Therefore, in the future the cab users will have to pay about $20 to every $1 that goes to a deserving person who has been injured or has had his property injured by the negligent operation of cab drivers.

VISITORS WILL BE PROTECTED

In support of this bill the argument is made that 50 percent of the passengers carried by the cabs are visitors. Therefore, the visitors should be well protected by insured cabs; that it is too difficult for visitors to collect from the present cab owners since they are very strict about paying claims to make sure that only deserving claims are paid. If a visitor is injured in a cab that is insured, he will have the same trouble. Insurance companies have a hundred years more experience in scaling claims down; threatening long drawn-out and expensive lawsuits to force low settlements, and in the art of making settlements satisfactory to themselves generally than the cab owners have had. I predict that visitors would have just as much trouble getting money out of insurance companies, and probably more, than they now have out of the cab owners. In either event a lawsuit that is brought would have to be instituted in the District of Columbia.

MULTIPLICITY OF LAWSUITS

It was shown before the subcommittee that under compulsory insurance for taxicabs, the public will pay $10 in the future for every $1 they expended for losses in the past. That does not mean that the insurance companies will get this additional $9. It means that ambulance-chasing lawyers will have more lawsuits. There will be more false, fictitious, and fraudulent claims. Claims that are now passed by as frivolous, will be exaggerated and contentions made for their payments if the cabs are insured, and the insurance companies will have to pay the loss that would not be insisted upon at all if the cab owners had to stand the loss. This bill will cause a multiplicity of lawsuits. The courts of Washington are 4 years behind. It will probably be a talking point for the insurance company that unless the claimant settles, it will take him 4 years to get his money through the courts if he gets it at all.

CAB RATES TO BE INCREASED

Sixth. This bill will cause taxicab rates to be increased. The operators will not receive any more money than they are now receiving. It will all go to the insurance companies, lawyers, and for frivolous claims. About one-fourth of the cabs will be taken off the streets. The other three-fourths will not do as much business because their rates will be high. Let it be remembered that so far as taxicab rates are concerned after this bill passes, the sky will be the limit. The cab users will be dependent upon the owners to set a fair rate. Whatever rate they set the public must accept. There will be no appeal from it, and no board or commission that will have any power on earth to disturb it.

HIGH INSURANCE RATES

Also let it be remembered that the four insurance companies that will write this business will get together and set the insurance rates. They will be plenty high. The sky will be the limit. They will not be annoyed or troubled by a board or commission attempting to interfere with them. Whatever rate the insurance companies fix will have to be accepted by the cab owners. The price paid will be passed on to the public.

Therefore, there will be no limit under this bill as to the amount charged the public for fares, and there will be no limit under the bill as to the amount that will be charged the cab operators for the cab insurance.

Of course, this will only hurt the small cab owners and independent operators. The big companies will carry their own insurance for an insignificant cost.

CAB OPERATORS CAREFUL

Seventh. The cab operators in Washington are usually safe. The testimony disclosed that the percentage of accidents in which taxicabs were involved was no greater than the percentage of accidents wherein private automobiles were involved. Instead of providing compulsory insurance which will encourage a driver to be more careless or negligent, I think that we should pass more drastic rules which will encourage efficiency and safety of operation. If a driver under present laws operates a vehicle while he is under the influence of liquor, or violates the law in any other way, he can have his driver's license taken away from him. This is a great privilege for him to be relieved of. In fact, it is his living, his business, and is a valuable asset. Therefore, cab drivers in Washington are considered more careful than in most places.

UNSAFE EQUIPMENT

It is argued that this law will take off the street defective and insufficient motor cabs. If that is an evil in the city, it can be very quickly remedied without compulsory insurance by merely passing an act which will permit some authority to pass upon the safety and construction of the equipment. That is no reason to charge the taxi users of Washington an extra million and a half a year.

Eighth. Suppose there should be a hundred cases next year for injury to persons or property that will not be satisfactorily settled by reason of the failure of this act. We will presume that 100 people will suffer loss in some way and to some amount. Will it not be better for 100 people to stand this loss themselves rather than set up a cumbersome and expensive machinery in the form of compulsory insurance that will cost the cab users of Washington one million and a half dollars extra, and possibly throw out of employment a thousand cab operators?

CARELESS OPERATORS SHOULD BE TAKEN OFF STREET

If the law is weak in regard to giving the proper officials of the District power to deny operators who are careless and negligent the right to continue in their business of driving cabs, the law in that regard should be strengthened. I do not think the law is weak in that respect, but if it is, let us change the law.

TAKE CABS OFF, PUT MORE BUSSES AND STREET CARS ON

Ninth. Government employees find it difficult to find a place to park their automobiles, and are, therefore, almost compelled to use a public conveyance. Now, if they are denied the privilege of using taxicabs, they will be forced to use street cars or busses. As you take more cabs off the street, you will put more street cars and busses on the streets.

INDEPENDENT OWNERS REASONABLE

Tenth. It should be said for the independent taxicab owners that they expressed a willingness to be required to carry reasonable insurance if the public wants them to, provided, of course, that the public will stand an increased rate to pay for the increased cost of operation, and that they will be permitted to get insurance for the same amount per cab as the large fleet operators. This bill, as I have pointed out, discriminates against the independent operator who owns his own cab and is now making a living for himself and family by its use.

INSURANCE COMPANIES FAIL TO PAY

Eleventh. If the cabs are insured by insurance companies, that does not necessarily mean that the public is properly protected. Such insurance companies have been breaking all over the country, and I doubt that people who have claims against taxicab companies have any more trouble collecting their money from the cab owners than from the insurance companies, as a general proposition. Only a few days ago an insurance company in New York carrying taxicab risk went into the hands of a receiver. It is causing all kinds of confusion and tying up of cabs, since this kind of insurance is not easily obtainable, and the best companies will not carry such a risk. So after all, if the public has got to depend upon "fly-by-night" companies or second-grade companies for insurance protection, they should certainly give consideration to such insecure protection in view of the million and a half dollars annual increase in cab fares, and the great unemployment and distress among cab drivers and their families which will result from the passage of such an act.

KEEPING UP WITH THE JONESES

Twelfth. It is contended that other cities have insurance, and Washington should not be backward in that respect. This is always a weak argument. It is the flimsiest kind of excuse for a raid on the public purse and does not in any way constitute a reason. "Keeping up with the Joneses" is always the poorest kind of an excuse for the passage of any law.

VERY LIMITED LIABILITY

Thirteenth. If this bill is enacted, each cab will be required to carry insurance against damage to person or property. If one person is injured, the insurance company will not be required to pay more than $2,500. If the judgment is $20,000, the cab owner will have to take care of the $17,500. If there is a judgment for property damage for $1,000, the insurance company will only have to pay $500 of it, and the cab owner will have to pay the other $500. The limit of the liability, regardless of the number of people injured, will be $5,000, with not more than $2,500 to one person, and if property damage, the limit is $1,000, with not more than $500 to one person.

TWO INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Therefore, this so-called "compulsory insurance" is just partial insurance, or for the payment of small claims, and instead of the cab owners paying only one premium like they are doing now, they will have to pay two premiums, one to the insurance company and the other to a fund of their own to protect them against judgments in excess of the insurance company's liability.

I understand Baltimore cab owners pay $420 annually per cab for limited liability. This is $35 a month. Considering the fact that insurance will cause juries to give higher verdicts and multiply the lawsuits, I predict that it will cost the cab owners more to carry the risk with the insurance companies than it now costs them to carry the entire risk. So instead of one premium, it will be a double premium. Instead of one light burden on the cab owner, it will be two heavy burdens, all of which will be passed to the people in the form of increased charges which will reduce the number of cabs, cause unemployment, and materially and substantially assist the bus and street-car companies, insurance companies, and ambulance-chasing lawyers.

Notwithstanding the strong support that this measure has from District officials that I have great confidence in, and that it is sponsored by others whom I believe to have always the public interest at heart, I must, for the reasons stated above, file this serious protest against its passage.

Respectfully submitted.

WRIGHT PATMAN.

INTERNATIONAL TECHNICAL COMMITTEE OF AERIAL LEGAL EXPERTS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield for a moment so that I may submit a rule?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution for printing in the RECORD under the rule:

House Resolution 398

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 271, a joint resolution providing for an annual appropriation to meet the quota of the United States toward the expenses of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts, and all points of order against said resolution are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the resolution for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

LIFE INSURANCE IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution for printing in the RECORD under the rule:

House Resolution 397

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9178, a bill to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment and amendments to all parts of the bill shall thereupon be in order. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. DRIVER, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution for printing in the RECORD under the rule:

House Resolution 392

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9391, a bill to provide for a census of unemployment, employment, and occupations to be taken as of November 12, 1934, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Census, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

LOANS FOR INDUSTRIAL PURPOSES

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, S. 3487, relating to direct loans for industrial purposes for Federal Reserve banks, and for other purposes, with a House amendment, insist upon the House amendment, and consent to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Messrs. STEAGALL, GOLDSBOROUGH, PRALL, LUCE, and BEEDY.

THE SILVER BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Ways and Means Committee may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the silver bill, and that the members of the committee may have the same time within which to file minority views.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

TAXICAB LIABILITY INSURANCE

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I did not even know that this bill for compulsory liability insurance on taxicabs was on the calendar today. In fact I did not know such a bill was pending. I have no interest in whether the bill passes or not, but I fear the discussion has gone off on a wrong tangent. I do not know, nor do I care, which insurance companies in the District of Columbia write this kind of insurance, except I do know from experience in connection with the liquidation of insurance companies in New York City, that no insurance company ever made a profit writing liability insurance on taxicabs, even though they charged a premium of about $28 a month. Every such company has failed, I believe. Even the mutual companies, composed of the independent taxi drivers, have failed. The losses are extraordinarily great in this particular risk.

The question resolves itself into whether you are going to protect the public in the District or save the operators this increased burden. I am for the taxicab driver of the District of Columbia. For a long time I have sympathized with his meager earnings, not even a livelihood. As a matter of fact, I do not think he has ever got a square deal in the District of Columbia, and it is a strange occurrence that the opposition to this bill now comes from the same sources that have continually opposed the taxicab driver in his plea for increased fare. Today these same opponents of fair income for the taxi drivers weep over increasing his burden. I always thought that the fares in Washington were ridiculously low and should be 50 or 100 percent higher. The question here, as I stated, is however, whether or not you are going to let the public ride in a common carrier without protection in case of accident. I cannot imagine any modern, progressive, or even a civilized community not requiring liability insurance from a common carrier. Personally, I would not let any man, woman, or child drive his own automobile without carrying liability insurance; surely a common carrier should not be permitted to do so. The automobile owner is the pet of some of our Representatives. No effort to make him cease using the streets as garages has succeeded, and that when garage rent is from $5 to $10 per month. Some day a great catastrophe will wake up the people here.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield for a short question.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Does the Government carry liability insurance on its own vehicles?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, well, of course the Government is a self-insurer like a lot of other big institutions and businesses. They talk about these independent taxi drivers. These independent taxi drivers may form a mutual insurance company and insure themselves, as they did in New York City and other progressive cities in this country. I cannot understand why in this one instance in America the common carriers should be exempt from carrying liability insurance to take care of the people who ride in their cabs. If the motive today is that you fear we might have to pay 5 or 10 cents more in fare, I do not believe that is a proper motive to stand in the way of protecting the public and the visitors to the District of Columbia. Every other city of any consequence in this Union protects its public and requires compulsory liability insurance to be carried by common carriers, while many States require every driver of an automobile to carry such insurance. Why, Mr. Speaker, just a few minutes ago we passed a bill requiring every owner of an automobile, even you and me, to carry liability insurance, after we have been once fined for negligence. Mark you, if you defeat this bill—as I fear you will—no taxicab driver will be compelled to carry liability insurance if they have a hundred accidents in which they were negligent. Such an inequality should not exist, and I hope this bill will pass.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the opposition to this bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] asks you why you want to limit the amount to $2,500 and $5,000 instead of making it unlimited in order to fully protect the public. Is this any argument that you should not pass this measure when we are trying to give them at least a little protection? Does not the argument the gentleman makes mean that you would put out of business every individual taxicab driver in the District?

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] gave one of the reasons why we should enact this bill into law. In Maryland we have taxicab insurance and in Virginia we have taxicab insurance, and when you prohibit the men here in the District of Columbia from obtaining such insurance it means you are protecting the railway company with its busses that operate in Virginia and Maryland.

I recall when we passed the merger bill for the District, the car companies at that time wanted the taxicab privilege and we refused it, because we were then trying to take care of the individual taxicab drivers. Now, by virtue of the Virginia law as well as by virtue of the Maryland insurance law, you have limited these men to obtaining passengers only within the District proper. I have stood on this floor fighting the so-called "taxi trust" with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. We have stood on the floor here time and time again fighting the meter system, but this was for the sole reason that it would not benefit the people in the District of Columbia as a whole as we wanted to protect them.

Another argument the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] makes is that they now will have to comply with the bill which we just passed. Are you helping the individual taxis? You are not; for the simple reason that the minute they have an accident they are required to have $5,000 and $10,000 insurance, whereas under this bill you only require them to obtain insurance of $2,500 and $5,000.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. PALMISANO. All right.

Mr. PATMAN. Does not the gentleman know that if both bills pass they will be doubly penalized if they violate the law? They will have to take out a $10,000 policy under the first law and also take out whatever insurance is required under the taxicab law.

Mr. PALMISANO. No; I think the Public Utilities Commission will go over the record made by the Congress and realize that we passed two special acts the same day, one to apply to the private owner and one to apply to the common carrier.

[Here the gavel fell.]

NO NECESSITY SHOWN FOR LAW

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] says that the insurance companies that carry this insurance are broke and that they cannot make any money out of it, yet the gentleman wants the public protected in unsound insurance companies. It will be just as hard to get money out of unsound companies as it will be out of unsound taxicab owners and operators.

This bill will create a cab monopoly. It will help the street cars and bus companies and the insurance companies and the ambulance-chasing lawyers, and it will cost the people of this city $1,500,000 extra that we know of, and possibly twice that amount before the first year is out.

There has been no argument made in favor of the bill. There has been no necessity shown for the passage of the law. There is no evil that has been pointed out to you that this law will correct, except, they say, other cities have insurance, why should not Washington have it. This is the poorest and the feeblest and the weakest argument that can ever be made for the passage of any law, and I ask you to vote against the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment thereto to final passage.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, would a motion to strike out the enacting clause now be in order?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion is not now in order.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, is not a motion to strike out the enacting clause a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER. It does not have preference over a motion for the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. We can vote down the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 44, noes 42.

So the previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 38, noes 63.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 188, answered "present" 1, not voting 112, as follows:

JAMES H. RAND, JR., THE REMINGTON ARMS CO., THE REMINGTON-RAND, INC., THE MUNITIONS TRUST, AND THE TYPEWRITER EMPLOYEES' STRIKE

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. FOULKES] may extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, the strike of employees of the factories of Remington-Rand, Inc., manufacturers of Remington typewriters, serves to call to our attention the antisocial attitude and policies of James H. Rand, Jr., head of the reactionary Committee of the Nation and sponsor of the activities of the well-known Dr. William A. Wirt, Jr., of Gary, Ind.

Officials of the National Labor Board and others familiar with the facts of the strike of Remington employees are well aware of the complaints against Rand. It is commonly known that, in the conferences with representatives of his employees, he sends his lawyer, instead of frankly and candidly meeting the spokesmen for his own workers. It is charged that he uses his attorney to wring as many concessions as possible from the employees and that, while Rand seeks to hold them to these concessions after the conferences, he frequently disregards the promises made by his authorized lawyer and refuses to be bound by them. It is an open secret that the fault lies with Rand and the Remington-Rand Co., not with the employees, and that, while the Remington concern has been wrangling with its workers, the manufacturers of Underwood typewriters just completed an agreement with their employees that was accepted by both sides in an amicable spirit.

It is well to inform ourselves about this man, James H. Rand, Jr. I need not tell you that his "Committee of the Nation" is a plutocratic organization whose aim is to handicap and sabotage any progressive policies of the N.R.A. and to interfere with any governmental action in the interest of the common people. I need not add that Dr. William A. Wirt is a kind of stalking horse for the Steel Trust and other big corporations that want to check the tendency to curb the rapacity of the great monopolies of the country.

It is both amusing and disgusting to look back nearly 2 years and read some of the drivel issuing from James H. Rand, Jr., when he spoke for the Republican Radio League and urged the reelection of Herbert Hoover.

Get this:

> By the middle of last July [1931] we began to detect signs of improvement. President Hoover's Reconstruction Finance Corporation and his other constructive measures had stemmed the tide of deflation. He had virtually put an end to bank failures. * * *
>
> After the smoke of politics has blown away I believe that every red-blooded American citizen wants to go ahead with the progress that we are making—progress that President Hoover's reconstruction measures have created and inspired during the past year. * * * America has never done the wrong thing in a crisis like this. I am confident that on November 8 we shall once more rally behind a veteran leader—this time, President Herbert Hoover.

Can you imagine anything more asinine, any arguments that are more senseless, any statements that are more devoid of foundation in fact?

Reading such trash, it is not difficult to understand why Mr. Rand's reactionary mind operates as it does and why he is in a conflict with the employees of his typewriter factories in which practically every informed person says he is dead wrong.

This leads up to the still more significant fact that Rand is part and parcel of the Remington Arms Co., the huge corporation that has piled up fabulous profits from the manufacture and sale of implements of carnage. The output of firearms and ammunition made by the Remington Arms Co. is one-third of the total production throughout the United States.

In a severe indictment of the Remington Arms Co., the Colt's Patent Firearm Manufacturing Co., and the Bethlehem Steel Co., Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH in a magazine article, headed "The War Makers", says:

During the period of depression, while millions of men and women walk the streets ill-clad and half-starved, while governments have been unable to pay their debts, while educational institutions have been starved of funds, it is a fact that the munitions manufacturers have been realizing profits of 12 and 20 and 30 percent during the entire period of the depression.

After this statement, Senator BORAH hurled this oratorical javelin at the munitions manufacturers:

The thought of making profits out of war, of building fortunes out of the misery and the sorrows of the maimed, the broken in health, and the insane, is revolting enough to anyone who has a spark of human sympathy or a sense of decency. But to foment discord and to spread false and sordid statements, to engender bitterness and suspicions and hate and fear among nations, all that such profits may be made and enlarged, reaches the dead level of human depravity! There is nothing lower in the scale of human avarice * * *. Capone, Dillinger on the highway, are not more heartless and bloodthirsty than the man who builds up armaments in another nation for the purpose of sending his own people to the front that they may furnish the means by which to murder them.

Such biting words apply, of course, to the manufacturers of Remington arms, as well as to other men and concerns accumulating wealth from the traffic in the tools of death and destruction. They are engaged in an indefensible business—a business that is indefensible in private hands, for the Government should manufacture whatever munitions are to be made, instead of allowing this to be done by greedy and grasping corporations.

Knowing the background and connections of James H. Rand, Jr., his behavior is better understood. It is now easy to realize why he is so bitterly denounced by his own employees and by multitudes of others who believe in progress and social justice.

H.R. 8987 AND H.R. 9143

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

H.R. 8987

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House of Representatives in behalf of H.R. 8987, Report No. 1446, Union Calendar No. 335, which was introduced by my distinguished colleague, Mrs. MARY T. NORTON, which was an action to establish a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the District of Columbia, and to determine its functions and for other purposes, which was approved July 15, 1932.

Briefly summed up this measure permits the authorities at Lorton to transfer hardened criminals or unruly convicts to other Federal prisons. In this manner the objective of Lorton can be maintained.

At this time I want to pay tribute to Capt. M. M. Barnard, General Superintendent of Penal Institutions, who has for many years served the Federal Government in the District of Columbia loyally and efficiently in developing character and honor among the inmates who are serving for offenses against society.

I believe that the objectives and ideals of the Lorton institution should have the full and sympathetic support of the Congress, and I hope that my colleagues will enact this measure without delay, as it will increase the efficiency of one of America's penal institutions.

H.R. 9143

Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House of Representatives on a subject which must be dear to the hearts of every American mother and father.

Scattered throughout the United States there are 12,000 American boys and girls whose fathers were killed in action or died from wounds or other causes during the World War. The compensation paid by the Government is only $10 a month for one child, and $6 for each additional child when there is more than one in a family. Then, too, the payment terminated, under the original World War Veterans' Act, when the child reached his or her eighteenth birthday.

Without assistance, other than that received from the Federal Government, these children will be forced to quit school at an early age and go to work to help support themselves and their widowed mothers, and also, in many cases, their younger brothers and sisters. They would thus begin the battle for life uneducated and untrained—handicapped because of the sacrifice their fathers made in defense of their country.

Realizing the plight of these fatherless boys and girls, Maj. Gen. P. C. Harris, The Adjutant General of the United States Army during and after the World War, brought the matter to the attention of the American Legion and American Legion Auxiliary, and both have made the education of war orphans one of their major activities.

These two patriotic organizations sponsored, and Congress in May 1928, passed an act amending the World War Veterans' Act so as to authorize the continuance of the payment of compensation after the age of 18 "to any child who is or may hereafter be pursuing a course of instruction at a school, college, academy, seminary, technical institution, or university."

The legislatures of the several States were then asked to supplement or match the Government compensation by establishing scholarships for war orphans at educational and training institutions of secondary and college grades. To date 25 States have done this, and it is confidently expected that several more will pass scholarship acts when their legislatures meet in regular session next year, including, I hope, my own State of Indiana. In most of the States, the scholarships amount to $150 a year for each child. Five States provide $200 a year, 2 States provide $250 a year, and 1, $30 a month.

The purpose of H.R. 9143, introduced by my distinguished colleague [Mrs. MARY T. NORTON] is to give the District of Columbia war orphans the same opportunities to obtain an education which they would enjoy if they made their homes in nearby Maryland or Virginia or any of the 25 States which have passed scholarship acts.

There is special need for these scholarships in the case of boys seeking appointments to West Point and Annapolis under the act of June 8, 1926, which increases the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy and the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy by 40 at each institution. Without such assistance few of these boys are able to attend preparatory schools or secure the services of tutors, and as a result the number of failures in the entrance examinations each year is very great. Appointments under the act of June 8, 1926, are made by the President from among the sons of those who were killed in action or died during the World War.

Briefly, this bill authorizes an appropriation of $3,600 a year until 1943, when the youngest of the war orphans will reach his or her twenty-second birthday, with a proviso limiting the amount to be paid for any one child in any one year to $200.

In addition to continuance of Government compensation after the age of 18 and State aid, which I have explained, the American Legion and its auxiliary have secured the hearty cooperation of school and college authorities in nearly all of the States. Many of our universities and colleges also secondary and preparatory schools now offer free tuition or scholarships to war orphan students.

It is not proposed to encourage all of these boys and girls to go to college. For most of them a high-school education is all that will be required in their life's work. The needs of each will be carefully studied and help extended only to those that can be benefited by further instruction and training.

This measure appeals particularly to me. My first and everpresent concern as a mother is the education of children. Instruction and training contemplated in H.R. 9143 will not only increase earning capacities of fatherless boys and girls of our American veterans, but will make them better and more useful citizens.

I feel the American people will applaud the passage of H.R. 9143 because it will prove to our American veterans that our people are keeping faith with them. We all remember the promises we made to our veterans when we sent them away to defend our Nation, and to those veterans who have passed to the Great Beyond and who have left dependent children, we owe an everlasting obligation. In a small way, H.R. 9143 will indicate that we still recognize the great obligation the American people owe to our American veterans.

The Government compensation is barely sufficient to provide the necessities of life even when the child is living at home with his mother. When the time comes to send the boy or girl away to college, special assistance is necessary. This bill will provide such assistance for the 109 war orphans residing in the District of Columbia.

I appeal to every Member of the Congress, and to every mother, to support this measure and become interested in these orphans of our American veterans who gave their all to preserve our American institutions. We must keep faith with our veterans by protecting their orphans. I thank you.

BRIEF REVIEW OF MY SERVICE RECORD

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues will not think me immodest to make a very short synopsis or review of some of the principal measures and bills that I have either originally suggested or heartily cooperated in seeking to enact into permanent law during my service in Congress.

SUPPRESS PROFITEERING

When I entered Congress March 4, 1921, the whole country was still shocked and shamed by the conscienceless profiteering that had gone on in the country during the World War, and how nearly 30,000 people had made and salted away millions of dollars and had thus become millionaires overnight, in selling munitions and supplies to the Government and our Allies, and also in selling the necessaries of life to our own civil population, all at prices which finally reached nearly 300 percent above the normal pre-war price. I was resolved to do everything in my power to prevent the repetition of such an outrage. The testimony showed that but for this tremendous and unjustifiable profiteering, the war debt would not have been more than one-half of what it actually was. Therefore, I introduced a resolution in December 1922 to set up a commission to study and advise how this conscienceless profiteering might be prevented in any future war, and continued to fight for its adoption until finally such a resolution was adopted, and such a commission created, and I was appointed a member of it and took an active part in its deliberations, and especially in the preparation of its final report. This study and report will be of very great value in guiding Congress and the Government in any future war.

MUSCLE SHOALS AND THE POWER TRUST

When I became a member of the Committee on Military Affairs the Muscle Shoals bill was pending, and I immediately entered into an active fight to preserve that great natural source of power as well as other power sites in the Tennessee Valley and its tributaries for the benefit of the people not only of the Tennessee Valley but of the whole country, and especially of the surrounding country. With Senator NORRIS and the small group of Senators fighting on the Senate side and with a small group fighting on the House side, I joined enthusiastically in the long fight to prevent these great sources of power from falling into the hands of the Power Trust. It was not until Franklin D. Roosevelt became President that we had any help in the White House, and under his inspiring leadership we enacted legislation that marks an epoch in the development of the whole country and sets up a yardstick for the measurement of power and light rates everywhere, and gives us a practical example of what rural electrification will mean to the people upon the farm and in small towns and villages. Consequently, I gladly cooperated with the effort to conserve to the people of the State of South Carolina the power possibilities in the Santee-Cooper development scheme. In like manner I have assisted in the effort of Greenwood County to set up a power plant on Saluda River. Other projects in this district and the State have received any aid that I could extend.

I hope that the cities, counties, and the State of South Carolina will conserve to themselves wherever possible the undeveloped water-power resources of our State. Other uses of power and other markets for power can and should be developed in addition to those now being preoccupied by the private power companies. The bill, which I largely drew and which passed the House of Representatives, setting up the Tennessee Valley Authority, recognized that the existing rates of private power companies should not be wantonly and unnecessarily destroyed. But if there must be a conflict between the public interests and the private profit-making company, then the public interest should and must prevail. I am glad to note that there is so far much cooperation and mutual helpfulness between the Tennessee Valley Authority and the private companies operating in that territory. I hope and believe that power and light rates everywhere will be gradually reduced, without detriment to innocent stockholders and to the great advantage and benefit of the industrial and private users of power.

GUARANTEE OF BANK DEPOSITS

I was one among the first Members of Congress to advocate and to urge the enactment into law of provisions guaranteeing to depositors in national banks and in State banks that may be members of the Federal Reserve System and may choose to join in the Federal Deposit Guarantee Corporation, so that people may have complete confidence in the banks and take their money to the banks and leave it there until needed, with Government assurance that when they do need it the money will be there. This is the best thing for the banks themselves, the best thing for the people themselves, the best way to revive business and to restore prosperity and to supply the people with the necessary capital to start new industries, to increase existing manufacturing plants, to build or to repair homes, and to start the wheels of business turning everywhere and keep them turning.

PUBLIC GAMBLING WITH THE PEOPLE'S MONEY IN THE PRODUCTS OF THE PEOPLE'S LABOR

It has long been manifest to me that one of the chief causes of fluctuations in business, and therefore one of the causes in bringing on depressions, is the reckless gambling on stock exchanges and commodity exchanges, all operated on small margins, without any intention of ever taking and paying for the stocks or cotton or wheat pretended to be bought or sold, but merely for the purpose of gambling upon the prospects of a rise or a fall in the prices of these things, which rise and fall is itself most largely influenced by this very whirlpool of speculation.

When the bottom fell out of things in October 1929, billions of dollars had been drawn from every nook and corner of the Nation into Wall Street to carry on the most stupendous orgy of business gambling that the world has ever known, not even excepting ancient Rome or modern Paris. I therefore vigorously cooperated in enacting legislation to stop such conduct in the future, which heretofore has caused wide-spread unemployment, has destroyed billions of property values, has wrecked millions of homes, and caused distress and suffering indescribable.

AID TO SMALL INDUSTRIES

Even during the Hoover administration I sought by appropriate bills to amend the law creating R.F.C. so that any person, firm, or corporation conducting a small industry could get help so as to enlarge its business and employ more laborers or to save itself from having to close down and thus discharging laborers. I therefore enthusiastically supported the Wagner-Garner bill conferring this very power upon the R.F.C., but the bill was vetoed by President Hoover, and all we could do was to protest. I am happy to say, however, that legislation is now in progress and soon will be approved doing this very thing for small industries, and thus insuring them against closing up where private bankers will not finance them. I have advocated keeping the people employed in the normal channels of industry. Every measure that would cause a dislocation and confusion in our existing economic structure is unfortunate and harmful to the people who must live by the labor of their hands.

Therefore my slogan has been, "Better a bad loan than a worse dole." I mean, better take a chance on not being able to collect every loan to small industries, which will keep people employed, rather than to let the industry close down and the people be fed by either a direct dole or by some subterfuge, which disorganizes the people, keeps them in a state of confusion and uncertainty, breaks up homes, and yet costs the Government more money than the total amount of bad loans to industry might ever be.

THE MONEY PROBLEM

The money question is very complicated and takes long and undivided study to get a clear idea of the influence of the volume of money upon the business of the country. This study I have been giving to the money question in a general way all my life, and especially for the last 5 years, and it is therefore not strange that I was the first Member of Congress to introduce a bill to prohibit the exportation of gold from America. The necessary effect of this would be to suspend gold payments in the markets of the world, and therefore we would be off the gold standard. We all remember that American business did not begin to breathe easily, and the produce of American farms, such as cotton, wheat, meat, and other products, did not begin to rise until after we had gone off the gold standard.

Furthermore, I early advocated and introduced legislation looking to the use of silver as a monetary base along with gold, and it is now gratifying to realize that both gold and silver will henceforth be used as a basis for currency to encourage and facilitate commerce and to raise the prices of crops and of commodities generally, and thereby to raise the price of wages. Money itself is not a commodity but is only a medium of exchange and a measure of value between different articles. The marvelous progress made toward restoration in America is largely due to the courageous steps taken by the Congress and the President in reforming our monetary system. Back of the mere gold and silver as the basis for Government credit is the total wealth in property of all kinds in America, and in addition to that the earning power of the people. The money problem is not yet entirely solved by the existing arrangement, but we are making rapid progress, and it will not be many years before America will again lead all the world in making progress toward social justice, humane institutions, and a fair and equal opportunity for every person to earn an honest living, with a little margin to lay aside for the rainy day and old age, so that the wages received or the proceeds of crops sold may be a more just and fair measure of the value of the services rendered and of the crops produced.

STOP FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGES

I early introduced legislation seeking to give Federal judges power to put into effect a moratorium on the foreclosure of mortgages, depending upon the circumstances in each individual case. I have earnestly advocated and assisted in enacting into law provision for making loans on private homes at low rates of interest, including both farm homes and city homes. I am now urging that loans be made on business property in order to pay back taxes and insurance, and that loans be made available for repairs, improvements, and replacements on all homes, wherever situated, and upon every class of business property. The home is the foundation of American civilization, and the work of building and repairing and replacing homes and business houses will go a long way toward absorbing the millions of unemployed.

AID TO SCHOOLS, COLLEGES, AND HOSPITALS

I have introduced legislation and supported every form of legislation looking to granting financial assistance upon adequate security to schools, colleges, and hospitals in order that they may raise cash to continue to operate from their endowment funds which are usually invested in slow assets. In like manner have I supported earnestly at every opportunity the granting of Federal aid to our public schools in which the masses of children find their only opportunity for education, and I feel quite sure that before the present Congress adjourns legislation now upon the way to this effect will become law, and fathers and mothers, trustees and teachers, and the friends of education everywhere, will be encouraged by the presence of Federal assistance. This will in no way subject local school administration to Federal control. It merely supplies necessary funds.

FORERUNNER OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Early in the depression, during the Hoover administration, I prepared, introduced, and sponsored legislation to create a body proposed to be called the "emergency finance corporation", with powers to lend money to States and subdivisions of States, including school districts, to construct public buildings of all kinds, to administer to the relief of the unemployed, to see that no man, woman, or child should suffer for food, clothing, or shelter, and to lend to any person, firm, or corporation upon adequate security, when such loan would promise to increase the number of persons employed, or to prevent the curtailment of employment and production. This was the germ of the idea on which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was based. I do not claim to have been the only person to advocate such organization, nor do I claim that the President and the Congress accepted my idea in toto, but I do feel justified in saying that I, too, was looking ahead, along with others, and that I, too, thus gave proof of my deep concern for the welfare of our country to relieve the distress of unemployment and to prevent suffering, freezing, and starvation.

PERMANENT NATION-WIDE PLANNING BOARD

For several years I have been advocating, as expressed in a bill formulated and introduced by me in the two last Congresses, the setting up of a permanent board to consist of 25 persons, serving without pay except actual traveling expenses, and to be appointed from all sections of the country and to represent all interests, groups, industries, trades, callings, and professions, and to study continuously and hold quarterly or semiannual meetings for conference and exchange of ideas to report yearly to the President and to the Congress their recommendations for stabilizing the economic conditions of the country, preventing unemployment and generally raising the standard of living for agricultural, industrial, and all wage-earning groups and classes of our citizens. Such a nonpartisan board, representing a cross-section of all of our citizenship, must be one of the final outgrowths of the National Recovery Administration. Such a board would give useful advice for the proper measures to smooth the way for all of our people to return from emergency conditions and emergency legislation to a natural, normal state of economic affairs. The members of such board should be divorced from politics and be excluded from seeking office. Such men would render a service to the Nation entitling them to the undying gratitude of our people.

FEDERAL AID TO PUBLIC ROADS

For several years I have been urging a departure by way of advance from the original program of Federal aid to main thoroughfares, such as interstate highways, so that Federal aid may be granted and Federal money used in grading and hard-surfacing every cross-country, connecting, and feeder road over which the mail is carried by a rural mail carrier.

FUNDS FOR BUILDING CONSTRUCTION

In May 1932 I began a movement to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act so that it might lend money to States, cities, counties, and towns, and also school districts at 2 percent interest for a period of 10 years or more, to construct roads, streets, public buildings, city halls, schoolhouses, market houses, sewerage systems, lighting and water plants, so as to give work to the unemployed, and at the same time make needed and lasting improvements that the people desire and could use to advantage. Certainly, to a limited extent at least, this plan was fundamental to and suggestive of the Public Works Administration, which itself was bottomed upon the Garner-Wagner bill which President Hoover vetoed.

FARM DIVERSIFICATION AND FARM PROGRESS

This has been a matter of deepest study and effort on my part. I have cooperated energetically in every movement reasonably promising to help the condition of the farming people. Long ago I proposed very liberal Federal aid toward setting up demonstration counties in different parts of every State, such demonstration to include farm marketing centers, which in turn would include canneries, creameries, refrigerator plants, and egg- and poultry-assembling plants so as to furnish to the farmer a market at the highest possible prices for any kind of vegetables, fruits, milk, corn, poultry, cattle, or other commodity any day in the year. I submit that before the cotton farmers of the South can become prosperous, as they deserve to be, they must have the opportunity to market not only cotton and cottonseed but all of these other things mentioned above which can be produced profitably in connection with cotton, without diminishing the amount of cotton produced, and enabling the farmer to produce his cotton at less cost per pound. In this connection I have planned not only for domestic fertilizers but also for the manufacture and distribution at low prices of commercial fertilizers. This program for the uplifting and betterment of the farm and of the farm population would call for and bring about the distribution of electric power to drive the farm machinery, to pump the water, to light the buildings, and generally to make farm life more attractive, so that our more talented boys and girls may be induced to set the example of leadership among the rural population.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

All who truly know war hate it. Because we hate disease, we have doctors, nurses, and medicines. About 75 percent of our ordinary Federal Budget goes to pay obligations of past wars, and preparations for future wars. We thought our part in the World War would end all war, set up a real League of Nations, and "make the world safe for democracy" for all time. But the other nations of the earth are boiling with unrest, arming to the teeth, putting ambitious dictators in power, and at any day may rush at each other in ships, airplanes, trains, and auto trucks, and if they do, horror, destruction, and death indescribable will come to men, women, and children in the great cities and industrial centers. Bombs filled with explosives and poisonous gases will rain from the sky. God help America escape such a fate.

OUR DEFENSE POLICY

With our varied climate and resources, with oceans on each side, and friendly peoples to the north and south, we can and should set the world a true example of preparing purely for defense against invasion of our land and outlying possessions. We have paid our debt of gratitude to France, and helped to rescue our British friends. If, from now on, they, and other European nations, do not or will not pursue peace, or merely defend themselves, it is just too bad. Remember, they owe us $10,000,000,000, and interest for 17 years.

If other nations just will fight, we can and should remain at home and defend our own shores and rights. We should never allow America to be drawn away from the home base and forced to send armies across the sea to fight. That is why we have a great Navy and the Panama Canal to transfer the fleet from ocean to ocean. That is why we need a great air force. With air-defense bases east and west, with ample stores of air bombs, with a large number of swift and powerful fighting planes, and with a large reserve of trained pilots, we can destroy enemy ships and transports before they ever reach our shores. That is why I have for 12 years insisted on increasing the strength and efficiency of our Air Corps. I was joint author of the Air Corps Act of 1926 and have now pending legislation to amend the same, to increase its power and striking force, to strengthen the Air Reserves, to create a junior air corps reserve, and to aid and encourage young civilians to learn to fly, to own planes, and to become trained to defend our people against invasion.

ADEQUATE GROUND TROOPS

The foregoing considerations show why we do not need the large standing armies that burden some other nations. We need a relatively small, but highly efficient, standing army to help train our volunteer National Guard and patriotic Organized Reserves.

If the Navy and air defense force fail to meet and to defeat any invading forces out at sea, and fail to drive them back or sink them, then we can call sufficient manpower to fill up the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Reserve divisions, to prevent actual landing or fatal inland invasion. This is why I have striven to secure a more efficient Regular Army, and have sponsored legislation to make the National Guard and Organized Reserves that "well-regulated militia" that George Washington planned and pleaded for.

VETERANS' RELIEF

Every President and lesser statesman from Washington to Roosevelt has urged adequate financial aid to ex-soldiers suffering disabilities caused by military service during war. Every nation in the world recognizes this obligation. I stand flat-footed upon this same proposition. But arguments and disputes arise over when and what disabilities are caused by military service. There is plenty of room here for honest differences of opinion. Here also doctors differ. But I do not approve of veterans' blocs or any other sort of blocs in Congress. Blocs are dangerous to free government, threaten to destroy democracy, to bring on dictatorships, and finally war, and then bathe again the world in blood. I hold a Congressman should represent with free and open mind every lawful interest in his district, and his efforts should be directed to the highest welfare of all the people, however poor, lowly, or humble, and should especially look far into the future, so as to plan for the safety, prosperity, and happiness of our children and grandchildren.

ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENT

I know personally the burdens of taxation. I see the homes of my relatives and friends sold for inability to pay taxes. Since coming to Congress I have never failed to vote for wise economy. I have fought measures before every committee that threatened waste, extravagance, and needless expense. Measures first suggested and fought for by me, especially in the manner of purchasing aircraft, have saved the taxpayers millions of dollars. So, in the selling and buying of Army lands. In one instance only, $280,000 was saved. In many other instances, other very substantial sums were saved. Without practicing a pennywise and pound-foolish policy, I have always advocated and voted for wise economy.

PROGRESSIVE POLICIES PURSUED

Though taught and trained in the political philosophy of Jefferson and Calhoun, I realize that science and invention, unknown to and undreamed of by them, have brought new conditions, new evils, new dangers, all demanding new treatment by governments, especially our Federal Government. In terms of time and distance, the whole United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is not as large today as South Carolina was during the American Revolution. These new conditions demand the new deal of Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Democratic Party.

I have long been studying plans for the decentralization of industry, as by subsistence homesteads, back-to-the-farm plans and movements, diversification of agriculture, conserving our hillside lands by soil-erosion control, converting our eroded, waste, submarginal lands into national forest reserves, plans to build farm marketing centers, including creameries, canneries, cold storage, assembling plants to ship poultry, eggs, meats, grains, nuts, and all other forms of farm produce. These will in turn demand distribution of electric power to farms and small villages, public ownership of water power sites now undeveloped, thus affording cheaper power and light rates, all on long-time financing at low rates of interest, and finally bringing freedom from debt, financial independence, prosperity and a chance to be happy and contented to all our people.

WHAT MEANS THE NEW DEAL?

Of course it is not a "destructive revolution", but a constructive plan for the people, all the people, not only a select group representing great financial interests as did Hoover, Mellon, and Mills, to have a real voice in government, and a fair and just share of what the people by their labor produce, whether they labor in field, factory, mine, railroad, office, store, home, or elsewhere. All honest, useful labor should have a just reward. It will never do to turn back. The old deal would now be intolerable. Of course, many changes must be made in these emergency administrations. But the basic idea of the new deal is the same as the American Declaration of Independence.

MILITARY INSTRUCTION IN AMERICAN COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, with the assistance of my good friend, Maj. William M. Connor of the Department of the Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, I have gathered some facts and assembled them that have proved very interesting to me, and may be useful to many other Members of Congress as well as readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Major Connor is from my native State of South Carolina, is a graduate of Wofford College, at Spartanburg, and a member of the South Carolina bar. It gives me great pleasure to acknowledge the assistance he has rendered me in compiling the facts enumerated in these remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I am a firm believer in a safe and sane system of national defense. I believe that the American and Republican and Democratic system of national defense is to have the smallest practicable Regular Army as a nucleus for mobilization and as a training agency in peace. But the larger number of people throughout the country that have military instruction and are capable therefore in the event of a national emergency of becoming leaders, either as commissioned officers or as noncommissioned officers, the better state of preparedness will the country enjoy. History shows that men may attain and keep reasonably abreast with the progress of the military art, even though the greater part of their time is devoted to their private business. If they love the military profession as a patriotic exercise, and continually keep abreast by reading the latest books and magazine articles, and carry on the courses of instruction offered to the Organized Reserves, then we may expect a very large percentage of these civilian officers to be most efficient in the unhappy event of war.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, the combination between an education for civilian pursuits and training in the fundamentals of the military art is entirely in keeping with the traditions and best thought of America as to what is a safe and sane system of defense. For that reason I thought a study and a compilation of the results of that study as to the extent of these concurrent and coexistent courses of study in our various universities and colleges would be enlightening and helpful.

MILITARY INSTRUCTION IN EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

Although the act of Congress, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts", approved July 2, 1862, did provide widespread Government aid, in the form of moneys derived from sale of public lands of the United States, for a class of State educational institutions, known as "land-grant colleges", offering instruction under State control in agriculture, the mechanic arts, and military tactics, it remains a fact that military instruction in educational institutions—State and private—was first made a matter of War Department and Army concern by the provisions of the Army Reorganization Act of July 28, 1866, at the close of the Civil War. The latter act authorized the President, "for the purpose of promoting knowledge of military science among the young men of the United States", to detail an Army officer to serve as president, superintendent, or professor of any college or university having a plant capacity for at least 150 male students and applying for such detail. The act also imposed a limitation of 20 officers at any time as the maximum that might be so detailed throughout the United States, and provided for apportionment of this number as nearly as practicable according to population. By joint resolution of May 4, 1870, this authority was enlarged to permit the loan by the Secretary of War of Government small arms and field artillery pieces available and needed for military instruction at any such college or university, upon approval of bond for safe-keeping and return of the same when required.

By act of July 5, 1876, this authority was again enlarged to make possible the detail to such educational institutions of not exceeding 30 Army officers at any time and as thus enlarged was embodied in section 1225 of the Revised Statutes of 1878. Another provision of the Revised Statutes, section 1260, expressly made eligible for such details retired officers applying for the same. Amendatory legislation enacted at various times during the succeeding 36 years greatly amplified this authority by providing for the detail of not exceeding 100 Army and 10 Navy officers to military-instruction duty in such educational institutions, including military institutes and academies, the land-grant colleges mentioned above to be preferred in the apportionment of this limited number; for the detail, with their consent, of such number of Army retired officers and noncommissioned officers as might be requested by schools throughout the United States as instructors in military drill and tactics; and for limited loan issues and allowances of available ordnance and ordnance stores to such educational institutions. All of this legislation became inoperative with the enactment of related provisions of a most comprehensive scope and sweep in the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended by that of June 4, 1920, which provided for a complete and coordinated Government system of military instruction in educational institutions throughout the United States as part of a statute-fixed scheme of national defense, and superseded prior legislation on the entire subject of Federal provision for military instruction in educational institutions, as declared by the Attorney General of the United States in an opinion rendered March 2, 1927.

It is interesting to note that during the last 12 fiscal years of operation of the legislation thus superseded, a period which terminated with the year 1916, there were not less than 324,000 students who received some military instruction at educational institutions to which Army officers were detailed to instructional work in military science and tactics, and of this number not less than 44,000 graduated; the report for the last-mentioned year showing 35,091 students under military instruction at 106 institutions wherein 63 active and 32 retired Army officers were serving as professors of military science and tactics and wherefrom 2,474 military students graduated. In such military instruction infantry drill and training predominated, and the main object thereof, as stated in War Department orders, was to qualify graduates completing military-training courses "to be company officers of Infantry, volunteers, or militia."

The new military-instruction system ordained by the National Defense Act of 1916, featured by Reserve Officers' Training Corps units organized in educational institutions throughout the country, was put in operation by the Reserve Officers' Training Corps Regulations of the War Department published on September 20, 1916—General Orders, No. 49. This system has for its primary object the development of a supply source of reserve officers qualified for active service in the military forces of the United States in time of national emergency. Such was the progress made in Reserve Officers' Training Corps organization that during the fiscal year 1918 the new system was in operation in 119 educational institutions wherein military instruction was given by 113 Army officers.

Of this total of participating institutions, 102 universities, colleges, and essentially military schools specially designated by the Secretary of War organized senior division units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, in which 36,000 students were enrolled and from which 3,364 were graduated in June 1918. For the fiscal year of its organization, 1917, and following fiscal year, Congress, respectively, appropriated $1,215,000 and $4,170,000 in the Army Appropriation Act of May 12, 1917, for expenses in connection with maintenance and operation of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

The final War Department program of Army intervention in the World War called for 80 divisions in France and 18 in the United States by June 30, 1919. The magnitude and urgency of this program, which involved special training of officers for such military forces composed of approximately 4,800,000 men, necessitated the establishment in all of the larger institutions in the United States, in the fall of 1918, of a corps of the United States Army, named the "Students' Army Training Corps", provided for in War Department Special Regulations No. 103 of that year, issued under authority of the Selective Service Act of May 18, 1917. The senior division units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps then established in 102 universities, colleges, and essentially military schools were replaced by units of the Students' Army Training Corps, maintained during the remainder of the World War emergency period. This corps, established as stated in the cited regulations—"to utilize effectively the plant, equipment, and organization of the colleges for selecting and training officer candidates and technical experts for service in the existing emergency"—was recruited by voluntary induction of registrants under the selective-service regulations, and on November 1, 1918, numbered about 170,000 men.

Such registrants, upon admission to the Students' Army Training Corps, became soldiers in the Army of the United States, subject to military law and military discipline at all times, as declared in the regulations. The unit organization was that of Infantry under the Tables of Organization, and the fundamental infantry training common to all branches of the service was prescribed for the corps as a whole. This war-time experiment in military education and training had Nation-wide support of college authorities and was made in about 600 colleges and universities throughout the United States.

The armistice of November 11, 1918, put an end to the necessity for the Students' Army Training Corps, which during the remainder of the academic and fiscal year 1919 was demobilized as part of the emergency military establishment, giving way to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, reconstituted within that period in 191 collegiate and 128 secondary institutions, with a total enrollment of more than 90,000 members, and officer personnel of 635 detailed to instructional work, with 599 noncommissioned officer assistants. Authority to supervise, direct, and control affairs relating to the reconstituted Reserve Officers' Training Corps was lodged in a Reserve Officers' Training Corps branch of the War Plans Division of the War Department General Staff, organized for the purpose on August 29, 1919, and having like authority over military training conducted with authorized Army aid, in any form, in other educational institutions. For the support of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps for the fiscal year following that of its reconstitution the sum of $4,000,000 was appropriated.

In the amendatory National Defense Act of June 4, 1920, the provisions of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, relating to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and military instruction in educational institutions were reenacted with certain amendments respecting organization, training, and administration of the corps. By such legislation the corps is made to consist of senior division units authorized for universities and colleges awarding degrees, land-grant colleges, and essentially military schools of higher order found qualified, and junior division units for all other public and private educational institutions. The President is authorized to prescribe the number, strength, and kind of units composing each division and the Secretary of War the standard courses of theoretical and practical military training for such units based on a minimum training requirement of a 2-year course averaging at least 3 hours per week. Camps for further practical instruction of members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are authorized for a maximum period of 6 weeks in any one year, which may be exceeded in time of actual or threatened hostilities. Membership in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps is restricted to physically fit students not less than 14 years of age who are citizens of the United States. Senior division graduates completing advanced course camp training and junior division graduates completing senior division courses and other prescribed training, of not less than 21 years of age, may be appointed by the President alone as reserve officers of the Army of the United States upon taking the obligation to serve in such capacity for a 5-year period.

Those senior division members who, after completing two academic years of training in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, may be specially selected for prescribed advanced training in the senior division, requiring 5 hours per week during the remainder of the course and camp attendance may, upon so obligating themselves, be allowed commutation of subsistence at the expense of the United States for such advanced training period, not exceeding 2 years, at a rate fixed by the Secretary of War not greater than the rest of the garrison ration prescribed for the Army. While attending advanced course training camps such members are also entitled to be paid as provided for seventh grade enlisted men of the Regular Army. Institutions maintaining Reserve Officers' Training Corps units may be issued such animals, arms, ammunition, supplies, equipment, and uniforms belonging to the United States, within the limits of appropriations therefor, as the Secretary of War may deem necessary. Payment of commutation in lieu of uniforms at a rate fixed annually by the Secretary of War may also be authorized by him. The legislation under review also authorizes the detail by the President to instructional duty with Reserve Officers' Training Corps units of such numbers of officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Regular Army as may be necessary; such personnel to be supplied without expense to the educational institutions concerned. By a specific provision of such legislation (section 55c of amended National Defense Act), schools and colleges not connected with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps system having a student body of at least 100 physically fit male persons above 14 years of age and conducting a course of military training prescribed by the Secretary of War may, in his discretion and without expense to such institutions, be furnished arms and equipment and available Regular Army officer and enlisted personnel necessary for military training purposes. Members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and other students under prescribed military instruction at institutions receiving Government aid provided for in aforementioned section 55c of the amended National Defense Act have no military status under the Articles of War and constitute no part of the Army of the United States as established by the first section of that act.

By War Department regulations governing the operation of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the regular 4-year course of the senior division is composed of the senior division basic course in the department of military science and tactics embracing the freshman and sophomore years of the academic department and the senior division advanced course concurrent with the junior and senior years of the academic department and the senior division advanced course are separately elected by enrollees therein, when not made compulsory by institutional authorities, and completion of either when once entered upon is a requirement for academic graduation as prescribed in such regulations. By these regulations the junior division course of military training for essentially military schools embraces 4 academic years of precribed theoretical and practical instruction, and for other than essentially military schools, a 3-year course thereof. The junior division course, regardless of duration, has for its basis the senior division basic course for infantry units. All instruction in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps must conform to the courses of instruction prescribed by the War Department and published by The Adjutant General. Academic credit for completion of Reserve Officers' Training Corps courses is, under the regulations, a matter expressly left by the War Department in the hands of the authorities of each institution, with the general declaration that "the successful conduct of Reserve Officers' Training Corps units depends in large measure upon the granting of credit on the same basis, hour for hour for practical and theoretical instruction, as is given for laboratory and classroom work in other departments."

Reserve Officers' Training Corps appropriations estimates and allocations, Army personnel details thereto, and the general operation of War Department policies touching the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are by existing regulations made functions of The Adjutant General; those respectively allotted to chiefs of arms and services being preparation of programs of instruction for the several kinds of units composing the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the making of training inspections and recommendations touching training, correlation of enrollment and location of units with mobilization requirements, and the assignment to Reserve Officers' Training Corps duty of officers qualified therefor. Corps area commanders exercise by devolution the supervisory powers of the War Department over the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, saving expressly reserved matters, and represent the War Department in the administration and operation of units thereof in accordance with law and regulations. The latter accord to heads of institutions maintaining Reserve Officers' Training Corps units that degree of general control over the department of military science and tactics ordinarily exercised over other institutional departments.

According to War Department figures, showing the strength of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps at the beginning of the academic year 1934, this corps consists of 217 senior division units with a basic course enrollment of 59,466 and advanced course enrollment of 13,907, organized in 8 essentially military colleges and universities (class MC), 4 essentially military schools (class MI), and 114 "civil colleges and universities" (class CC), and 103 junior division units with a total enrollment of 39,942, organized in 37 essentially military schools (class MS), 60 high schools (class CS), and 5 other institutions (class CS). The 217 senior division units, numbering 73,373, are composed of 87 Infantry units, numbering 41,654, 11 Cavalry units numbering 3,541, 20 Field Artillery units numbering 11,958, 21 Coast Artillery units numbering 7,673, 1 Air Corps unit numbering 28, 22 Engineer units numbering 4,731, 10 Signal Corps units numbering 1,393, 23 Medical Corps units numbering 1,003, 8 Dental Corps units numbering 304, 4 Veterinary Corps units numbering 118, 9 Ordnance units numbering 827, and 1 Chemical Warfare Service unit numbering 143. The Reserve Officers' Training Corps as a whole accordingly has a student strength of 113,315, in 320 units maintained in 228 institutions throughout the United States. The instructional and administrative work involved in the institutional operation of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps system for the academic year 1934, as shown by War Department figures, is done by 707 Regular Army active officers (including 19 colonels, 48 lieutenant colonels, and 162 majors), 12 warrant officers, 501 noncommissioned officers, and 421 other Regular Army enlisted men, stationed at such institutions. For the fiscal years 1921 to 1934, inclusive, intervening since the passage of the amendatory National Defense Act of June 4, 1920, Congress has expressly appropriated for the maintenance of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps a total of $47,853,932; but of the sum of $3,466,531 so appropriated for the fiscal year 1934 only $2,621,000 became available for obligation in conformity with subsequently imposed restrictions on Federal expenditures.

The Reserve Officers' Training Corps system is in successful operation in all the 49 land-grant colleges within the continental United States. War Department figures show senior division units in these 49 institutions to have a total enrollment of 44,843 for the academic year 1934. The following in respect of senior division enrollment in land-grant colleges is extracted from chapter II, part V, volume II, of United States Department of the Interior, Office of Education Bulletin, 1930, No. 9, entitled "Survey of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities":

> Enrollment in the basic course and military instruction through freshman and sophomore years is required of all physically qualified male students in all land-grant institutions except the University of Wisconsin, in which institution it became optional in 1923 by act of the Wisconsin Legislature. Under the elective system at the University of Wisconsin student enrollment in military education has diminished from 1,528 in 1922–23 to 648 in 1927–28. The prevailing sentiment in the land-grant colleges appears to be strongly in favor of the required feature. The Association of Land-Grant Colleges has declared itself repeatedly in favor of this policy.

All except three of these land-grant colleges are within the War Department category of 114 "civil colleges and universities", class CC, as classified for Reserve Officers' Training Corps purposes.

The eight degree-granting institutions classified by the War Department for Reserve Officers' Training Corps purposes as "military colleges and universities", wherein military discipline is constantly maintained and the entire student body required to pursue military training throughout the course, have a total Reserve Officers' Training Corps enrollment of 5,734 for the academic year 1934. Two of these military institutions—The Citadel, of South Carolina, and Virginia Military Institute—have for their respective executive heads Gen. Charles P. Summerall, United States Army, and Maj. Gen. John A. Lejeune, United States Marine Corps. Three of the same—Agricultural and Mechanical College, of Texas; Clemson Agricultural College, South Carolina; and Virginia Agricultural and Mechanical College and Polytechnic Institute—are land-grant colleges.

To the organized peace establishment erected by section 3 of the amended National Defense Act, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps is indispensable as a personnel replacement source. For example, War Department figures show that in the 14-year period from 1920 to 1933, inclusive, a total of 65,247 of a grand total of 66,063 graduates of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps were duly commissioned in the Officers' Reserve Corps. Also, the thousands Reserve Officers' Training Corps members whose military training ended with the senior division basic course or junior division course, and who consequently have not qualified for appointment in the Officers' Reserve Corps are not lost to national defense, as the training they have undergone fits them for service as noncommissioned officers in the National Guard and Organized Reserves, and in the emergency forces in time of war.

Touching the individual benefits resulting from Reserve Officers' Training Corps instruction, the following summary of opinions of Reserve Officers' Training Corps graduates is illuminating. It is the upshot of a study of about 10,000 returns to about 16,000 questionnaires mailed to Reserve Officers' Training Corps graduates by the Commissioner of Education, Department of the Interior, in 1931. The inquiry embraced the 1920 to 1930 classes of 54 selected institutions in 39 States and the District of Columbia, and the study is from the pen of Lt. Col. Ralph Chesney Bishop, Field Artillery Reserve. An analysis of the replies of about 10,000 graduates made by Colonel Bishop was published as United States Department of the Interior, Office of Education, Pamphlet (1932) No. 28, entitled "A Study of the Education Value of Military Instruction in Universities and Colleges", which includes a most valuable summary thus formulated:

> 1. The volume of opinions drawn from more than 10,000 college graduates who completed the R.O.T.C. course in military science and tactics gives full recognition to the educational values derived from the course. This is apparent from the standpoints of both general education and discipline and educational subject matter. The course is recognized for its utility in developing right habits of mind and body and qualities of character that are fully as useful in everyday experience as they are when applied to military objectives.
> 2. The R.O.T.C. is especially recommended by graduates because it has brought to them a more definite and serious recognition of a number of the more important duties and responsibilities of a democratic citizenship.

3. Graduates of the R.O.T.C. have come to feel that some college authorities and faculties have not given sufficient recognition to the R.O.T.C. as an educational instrument, largely through a failure to perceive many of the educational values that have been developed through its agency.

4. Although graduates recognize on the whole that military education is equal in quality to that which is academic or professional, they feel that the R.O.T.C. course could be strengthened by better pedagogical training on the part of the teachers of military science, and by their placing greater stress upon the study of principles rather than upon military technique.

5. The graduates would strongly oppose the abolition of military training from institutions of collegiate grade, and are of the opinion that the contribution made by the R.O.T.C. to a young man's general education is sufficient in value to warrant the continuance of the course as a curriculum requirement.

6. Ninety-three and six-tenths percent of the 9,636 replies attest that R.O.T.C. training does not create a militaristic attitude in the minds of those who have experienced it, but that it does furnish graduates with a sense of individual responsibility toward national welfare and security.

The Reserve Officers' Training Corps has emerged from the experimental stage and become a governmental institution vital to national defense.

According to War Department figures, the 50 schools and colleges not connected with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps system, which receive Government aid under the provisions of section 55c of the amended National Defense Act have a total of 12,075 students enrolled for the academic year 1934 in the military training course prescribed by the War Department therefor. There are 45,776 male students matriculated in these 50 institutions. Details to military training duty in some of these section 55c schools are 1 commissioned officer, 2 warrant officers, and 6 noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army. For military supplies and equipment for this class of institutions for the fiscal years 1921 to 1934, inclusive, Congress has expressly appropriated a total of $84,507.

Other reliable data concerning military training in public and private high schools are of interest. Records of the Office of Education, United States Department of Interior, published in Bulletin (1931) No. 20 thereof, show that there were 23,930 public high schools in the United States in 1930 and that reports containing data on military drill were received from 22,237 such schools, which constitute 92.9 percent of the total number thereof. The total male enrollment in the school year 1930 in these 22,237 high schools reporting was 1,991,202. Of these schools a total of 338 offered military drill taken in that year by 57,179 students. The latest school year for which military training statistics relating to private high schools and academies are available is 1928. In that year the total enrollment of male secondary students in 2,448 private high schools and academies reporting to the Office of Education was 128,596; and in 116 of these institutions 16,528 students were enrolled in military drill.

As stately and sturdy as the great oaks about it on the banks of the Ashley stands The Citadel, the military college of South Carolina, a fine example of those military centers of higher learning which provides a sound cultural, vocational, and military education, and so fit their student bodies for peace and war service of fellowman, State, and Nation. The Citadel was established in the city of Charleston as a public military institution of collegiate grade by act of the general assembly of December 20, 1842, graduated its first class of six men in 1846, and continued in successful operation until a few months prior to the fall of Charleston, in February 1865, when the institutional plant and grounds at Marion Square were occupied by Federal troops. Within this period of 22 years The Citadel had graduated 240 men. Of this number about 200 were officers in the Confederate service in the Civil War, 43 of whom were killed in action. But this resplendent record by no means includes the full contribution of trained man power made by The Citadel to the Confederate cause. At least reference must be made to the first hostile shot of the Civil War fired on January 9, 1861, by a detachment of Citadel cadets, commanded by a Citadel graduate, manning a battery of 24-pounders on Morris Island. The accomplished objective was to drive off the steamer Star of the West, then attempting the relief of Fort Sumter. On several other occasions during the Civil War The Citadel cadets as part of the military organization of the State were ordered to emergency duty in the field. The general assembly, after the reconstruction period, made provision for the reopening of this institution on October 1, 1882, which thereupon enrolled 189 cadets, and has ever since prospered.

In 1910 that body declared its title to be "the Citadel, the military college of South Carolina"; and in 1919 and 1920 made the necessary appropriations for its relocation on the banks of the Ashley River. It now has a student enrollment of 600 and a faculty of 40 members, including 7 Regular Army active officers detailed to the department of military science and tactics to conduct military training required of all students who live in cadet barracks under discipline similar to that enforced at West Point. Such training is provided in 2 units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, 1 infantry and 1 coast artillery. Upon satisfactory completion of required work therefor, The Citadel awards the degrees of bachelor of science, bachelor of arts, and civil engineer. The State of South Carolina makes annual provision for the support of 78 Citadel cadets, these scholarships being awarded by competitive examination as vacancies occur in the various counties.

The past gives assurance that the Citadel will continue to produce leaders of men in peace and war with that mind and character equipment which is the ultimate reliance of the State. Ninety-six graduates now hold commissioned office in the Regular Establishments of the land and naval forces, and the great majority of graduates in recent years who are physically qualified are members of the Officers' Reserve Corps of the Army. In 1918 there were 624 living graduates of military age, of which number 325 had World War service as commissioned officers.

SOLDIERS AS TEACHERS

Many American soldiers have contributed of their time and talents to the uplifting of their respective generations by teaching. I have not undertaken to make an exhaustive list, but hastily recall to memory the case of Thomas Jonathan Jackson (popularly known as "Stonewall"), who taught in the Virginia Military Institute many years prior to the opening of hostilities between the States of the North and the States of the South. In like manner William T. Sherman became the first president of the college established by the State of Louisiana near Alexandria, and this institution has been later developed into the Louisiana State University, located at Baton Rouge. General Sherman resigned his place as the president of this institution upon the secession of the several Southern States and had a most conspicuous career as an officer in the Army, not only during hostilities but thereafter up to the date of his death. After the great conflict known as the "War between the States" had ended, Gen. Robert E. Lee, a soldier and a citizen "without fear and without reproach", became the president of what was then called Washington College—now Washington and Lee University—a small and struggling institution at Lexington, Va., and there he labored with great success in helping to heal the wounds between the sections by inspiring all the young men who came under his influence to lend their best services to the rebuilding not only of the South but of the entire Nation, and there his body lies in peace and in honor, a shrine for every patriot in the land. So, Gen. Stephen D. Lee became the head of the Agricultural and Mechanical College in the State of Mississippi and rendered signal service to that State, and to the country, by his energy and inspiring example.

I am happy to mention that a private soldier, William Moffatt Grier, some years after the close of that sectional struggle, became the president of Erskine College at Due West, S.C., and his name is held in precious memory by thousands throughout the South who came under both direct and indirect influence of his patriotic example and Christian character. So Col. Asbury Coward became president of The Citadel, the military college of South Carolina, at Charleston, and his work there has contributed to the making of hundreds of stalwart and staunch leaders in every line of human endeavor. In like manner I rejoice to record that after the close of that tragic era at Appomattox, Maj. Benjamin Sloan, a graduate of the United States Military Academy and distinguished as an artilleryman in Lee's army, gave his talents and his long life to the service of South Carolina in teaching at the South Carolina University and for several years was its beloved and honored president.

SOLDIERS OF THE WORLD-WAR PERIOD

I have not tried to make a check of all of the soldiers who distinguished themselves in the World War that are now conspicuous as teachers, but hastily record those who come first to memory. I am quite sure there must be scores, if not hundreds, throughout the country following the examples of Jackson, Sherman, Lee, and others. But most notable are the cases of Maj. Gen. John A. Lejeune and Gen. Charles P. Summerall.

After the retirement of General Lejeune as Commandant of the United States Marine Corps, he accepted the superintendency of the Virginia Military Academy at Lexington, and there he has continued in a station of great usefulness to inspire the lives of young men to do noble deeds by rendering patriotic service to the State and Nation.

In like manner, when Gen. Charles P. Summerall retired after having served as Chief of Staff of the United States Army, he was offered and accepted the presidency of the South Carolina College at Charleston, S.C., called for a long time "The Citadel." I never knew General Summerall until he came to Washington to assume the responsible station of Chief of Staff, but I knew his reputation as a soldier and as a leader and commander of other American soldiers upon the battlefield. I have heard many other distinguished American officers who won laurels with our armies in France testify that the career of General Summerall as the commander of troops in the actual conflict is unrivaled and unsurpassed in the American Army. This is what one would expect who knows the background of General Summerall.

Great men usually draw their greatness from the minds and hearts of their mothers. I have the testimony of many witnesses and of strong corroborating circumstances that the mother of General Summerall was a woman of rare talents, with a character as true and as pure as a vestal virgin, and with a mind as clear as the sunlight itself. For several years before her marriage to an ex-Confederate soldier she taught in the country schools of Abbeville and Laurens Counties, and wherever she taught, she left memories that grew more precious with the passing years.

On one occasion I saw four ladies, all of them about 90 years old or more, gathered in one room, all of whom had been pupils while little girls in a school taught by General Summerall's mother, née Miss Pelot. One of them had an oldtime autograph album with a verse composed and written by her teacher, Miss Pelot, expressing the noblest sentiments in purest form of Spencerian penmanship. Another told of the many moral maxims that Miss Pelot impressed upon all of her pupils, and how they lingered in memory throughout life. Another produced an oldtime lap writing desk that had been the gift by Miss Pelot to the mother of the possessor of this precious heirloom. Still the fourth, with cracked voice sang a precious song composed and set to music by Miss Pelot herself. But that voice was prompted by a heart filled with loving memory, and those tones brought tears to every eye in that room. From such mothers great men come, and it is no wonder to those of us who have later learned from what material of mind and spirit General Summerall proceeds, that he has climbed by his own unaided efforts and solely upon the basis of merit to the highest pinnacle in the Army of our great Republic.

Furthermore, after General Summerall had retired from the Army with at least a recompense in the form of retired pay for the remainder of his days, it was no surprise that he responded to the call of the citizens of the native State of both his mother and his father and went to South Carolina to head her great military college. Great as have been the services of General Summerall from the days that he was commissioned as second lieutenant in the Army until his final retirement with the rank of a full general, yet I believe that the crowning glory of all of his life's activities will be his work as president of The Citadel. Here he will be in daily and intimate contact with the lives of hundreds of young men, 90 percent of whom are certain to become leaders in their respective communities and in their several callings. Long, long years after the soul of General Summerall shall have joined his sainted mother in the spirit world these young men, and doubtless their sons and grandsons, will be inspired to noble living and heroic action by the example of this now great teacher, who was formerly a great soldier. Outside of inheriting a sound body and a sound mind with noble impulses, and in addition to enjoying the family environment and example of honorable living and patriotic service, the greatest influence that can come into the life of any person is to be under the guidance and subject to the leadership of a truly great teacher. Men become great teachers not merely because of the knowledge they possess but more especially because of the principles of character and of right living that possess them. Happy is the man or woman who can look back through the years to the days in school or in college when he or she was directed and guided not only by the instruction but by the example of a truly noble and unselfish teacher. Such is the case of General Summerall, and I rejoice in the opportunity I have of recording my gratitude to him for the service he is rendering our State and our country.

TAX EXEMPTION OF PROPERTY OF THE NATIONAL SOCIETY OF THE SONS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 6037) to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all property belonging to, or held by, the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution in the District of Columbia, used and occupied by that society, so long as the same is owned and occupied, be exempt from taxation, national and municipal.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NEEDY BLIND OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 8517) to provide for needy blind persons of the District of Columbia.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Board of Public Welfare of the District of Columbia (hereinafter called the "Board") is hereby authorized and directed to enforce the provisions of this act for the purpose of maintaining, supporting, and caring for needy blind persons, residents of the said District of Columbia, citizens of the United States, and not inmates of any institution supported in whole or in part by the Federal or District Governments, and said Board shall have the power, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia (hereinafter called the "Commissioners"), to make and enforce all proper rules and regulations therefor, and said Board shall create a new subdivision which shall be devoted exclusively to the carrying out of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. As used in this act, the term "needy blind person" shall be construed to mean any person who by reason of the loss or impairment of eyesight is of such condition that he cannot be rehabilitated for self-support through the facilities offered by the District rehabilitation service of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and who is unable to provide himself with the necessities of life and who has not sufficient means of his own to maintain himself and who is otherwise qualified as further set forth in this act.

SEC. 3. In order that any person who shall have become blind while a resident of the District of Columbia may be entitled to aid under the provisions of this act such person must be at least 16 years of age and a resident of the District of Columbia for 1 year next preceding his application for aid hereunder: Provided, That in order that any person whose blindness originated while he was not a resident of the District of Columbia may be entitled to aid hereunder, such person must be at least 21 years of age and must have been a bona fide resident of the District of Columbia for a period of 7 years immediately preceding the filing of his application for aid hereunder: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or render void, so far as blind persons are concerned, any existing statutes which create or define a liability on the part of certain persons to support and provide for poor relatives.

SEC. 4. To receive aid under this act, the applicant shall file his application with the Board, accompanied by an affidavit signed by himself stating his age, sex, places of residence during the period stipulated in the District of Columbia, his financial resources, and incomes, the name and address of his next of kin, degree of blindness, how long blind, what employment he has had, his general physical condition, and such other information as the Board may designate.

SEC. 5. No aid shall be granted hereunder until the Board is satisfied from the evidence of at least two reputable citizens of the District of Columbia that they know the applicant has the residential qualifications to entitle him to the aid asked for, and from the evidence of a duly licensed and practicing physician whose duty it shall be to describe the condition of the applicant's eyes and to testify to his blindness, which evidence shall be in writing subscribed to by such witnesses, subject to the right of cross-examination by either the Board or the Commissioners; and if the Board is satisfied by such testimony that the applicant is entitled to aid hereunder, it shall, without delay, allow such sum as it finds needed: Provided, however, That the yearly income of the applicant from all sources taken together with the aid granted shall not exceed $1,200: Provided further, That the Board shall transmit to the Commissioners a record of their actions in granting or refusing to grant aid to each blind applicant, and any blind applicant who is dissatisfied with the finding of the Board regarding his application for aid, may appeal to the Commissioners who shall now consider the application and if two of the Commissioners shall find that the applicant is entitled to aid under the provisions of this act, they shall then and there award such aid as they deem proper: Provided, however, That the total yearly income of the applicant together with the award shall not exceed $1,200, and the Board shall pay immediately to the applicant blind person the sum awarded by the said Commissioners.

SEC. 6. The Board shall investigate semiannually, or oftener, the qualifications of blind persons who receive aid hereunder, and may increase or decrease the allowance within the limits prescribed by the act; or if said Board is satisfied that any person on the list is not entitled to aid hereunder, they shall strike off and entirely remove him from said list, and shall forthwith notify the Commissioners of such action: Provided, however, That the person heretofore receiving aid may take an appeal to the Commissioners from such action as if it were an original application for aid: And provided further, That such an appeal must be filed within 30 days from the notification by the Board to the beneficiary hereunder of the intended reduction or discontinuation of aid, and no reduction or discontinuance of aid shall be operative until after rendition of the findings of the Commissioners on said appeal.

SEC. 7. No person shall be eligible to receive aid under the provisions of this act who, after receiving said aid publicly solicits alms in any manner, either by wearing, carrying, or exhibiting signs denoting blindness for the securing of alms, or by any signs calling attention to blindness exhibited on wares and merchandise, or the carrying of receptacles for the purpose of securing alms, or the doing of the same by proxy, or by stationary or house-to-house begging, or any other means of publicly securing aid.

SEC. 8. Any person qualifying for and receiving aid hereunder who removes himself from the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia and thereby ceases to be a resident, shall no longer be entitled to the benefits and aid under the provisions of this act, but temporary absence for a reasonable length of time shall not work a forfeiture hereunder, when such prolonged absence is caused through illness.

SEC. 9. The benefits hereof shall not be granted to any person between the ages of 16 and 55 years who, having no occupation and being both physically and mentally capable of some useful occupation, or of receiving vocational or other training, refuses for any reason to engage in such useful occupation, or refuses to avail himself of such vocational or other training, or unless for good cause shown signifies his willingness and readiness to enter upon a course of such vocational or other training within a reasonable time: Provided, That no person shall be entitled to the benefits of this act who shall refuse to submit to any treatment or operation to effect a cure when such treatment or operation is recommended by an examining oculist and approved by the Board.

SEC. 10. Relief under this act shall be denied whenever a person who is blind or partially blind within the definitions of this act is married to another who is also blind or partially blind, unless one shall not have been blind or partially blind at the time of the marriage, or unless they shall have been married for 2 years prior to the passage of this act; and where relief has already been granted, such relief to one shall be discontinued whenever a person who is blind or partially blind within the definitions of this act is married to another who is also blind or partially blind, and the maximum paid under this act for their joint care and support and relief shall not exceed the sum of $600 annually; but in the event the marriage is already entered into for 2 years at the time of the passage of this act, or that either was not blind or partially blind at marriage, such persons shall each be permitted to file his and her application: Provided, That no person shall benefit under the provisions of this act who hereafter shall enter into marriage with an indigent person until the marital relations are terminated in a manner recognized by law.

SEC. 11. No person shall be eligible to the benefits of this act who shall hereafter either intentionally deprive himself of his eyesight or assist in the destruction thereof by others; or hereafter shall lose his eyesight during the perpetration of a criminal offense; or shall hereafter lose his eyesight by reason of vicious habits; or through hereafter indulging in so-called "alcoholic beverages": Provided, That no payment of any money shall be made under this act for the care or relief of any blind person who has for 5 years preceding his blindness or loss of sight been dependent upon public relief unless such dependency shall have been caused through physical or mental incapacity.

SEC. 12. Whenever it appears after the death of any unmarried person who has received aid under this act that his estate, after deducting the exemptions allowed by law, has property over and above a sufficient amount to pay the expenses of his last illness and burial, such property shall be charged with the amount paid to such person during his lifetime; and claim may be filed against his estate for the recovery of the said amount, and an action may be brought in the name of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel to recover the same, and the statute of limitations shall not be computed until after the death of the person receiving aid as above provided.

SEC. 13. Any person who attempts to obtain, or obtains, by false representation, fraud, or deceit, any allowance under this act, or who receives any allowance knowing it to have been fraudulently obtained, or who aids or assists any person in obtaining or attempting to obtain an allowance by fraud, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 14. In order to carry out the provisions of this act there is authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, the sum of $75,000, payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and annually thereafter, the Commissioners shall include in the estimate of appropriations for said District of Columbia, such an amount as may be necessary for this purpose; and the Commissioners, upon nomination by the Board, shall appoint a supervisor and such additional personnel as may be necessary to administer this act, at such salaries as may be fixed for similar services by the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923; and such employees may be removed by the Commissioners upon recommendation of the Board: Provided, That whenever necessary said Board shall appoint an acceptable member of the personnel to stand in loco parentis to any minor qualifying for aid hereunder.

SEC. 15. The provisions of this act are to be liberally construed to effect its objects and purposes, and if any section, subsection, or subdivision of this act is for any reason held to be unconstitutional, such decision shall not affect the validity of such remaining portions of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, section 3, line 18, strike out "sixteen" and insert "nineteen" in lieu thereof.

Page 4, section 5, line 3, beginning with the word "Provided", strike out all to and including "$1,200" in line 6. Strike out the word "further" in said line 6.

Page 4, section 5, line 15, strike out lines 15, 16, 17, and 18.

Page 6, section 10, strike out all of said section 10, and renumber following sections.

Amend the numbers of the sections.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a few questions for the RECORD. This bill is to pension needy blind in the District of Columbia. There are 157 blind in the District and 63,487 in the United States. I wish this law could be made to include all of them. What age must a blind person be to be eligible under this bill?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I will answer the gentleman, if he will permit. I will say that extensive hearings were held by the subcommittee, and 60 representatives of the blind and social-service agencies appeared. The age limit is 19 where the person became blind while in the District of Columbia, and 21 where the blindness occurs outside.

Mr. PATMAN. How long must a person who received his blindness remain in the District to be eligible for relief?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. A person who becomes blind outside the District must have attained the age of 21. A person who shall have become blind while a resident of the District of Columbia must be at least 19 years of age, and a resident for 1 year preceding his application.

Mr. PATMAN. What if a blind person moves to the District now? How long will he have to remain here before he is eligible for this relief?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Seven years.

Mr. PATMAN. In excess of what amount of property or income would prohibit a person receiving a pension?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. He must be totally unable to take care of himself in providing the necessaries of life. The payment depends upon the actual need.

Mr. PATMAN. How much will be the amount?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The amount is left to the Board of Welfare. Therefore, there would be varying amounts paid according to need.

Mr. PATMAN. How many States have relief for the blind now?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There are 26 States, and payments range from $300 up to $600 for the individual. This bill provides a varying scale and would not likely average more than $400.

Mr. PATMAN. In the case of veterans in any public institution supported by public funds they do not receive a pension in excess of $6 a month, if it is nonservice connected, or $15 a month if it is service connected. Is there any provision in this law in regard to pensioning those who are taken care of in homes?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes. As long as they remain within the institution they do not come under the provisions of this act.

Mr. PATMAN. As long as they are taken care of otherwise?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JENNIE BRUCE GALLAHAN

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 2035) for the relief of Jennie Bruce Gallahan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO]?

Mr. PATMAN. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman a question about this bill.

What is this bill for?

Mr. PALMISANO. It is to pension the widow of Lieutenant Gallahan, in the fire department, who was killed in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. PATMAN. Is the widow drawing a pension now?

Mr. PALMISANO. I understand so; yes.

Mr. PATMAN. How much?

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not know quite what the pension is.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it $60 a month?

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not know.

Mr. PATMAN. Well, who does know?

Mr. PALMISANO. The gentleman has made a study of it and he probably knows. I do not know what it is.

Mr. PATMAN. I thought it was $60, but I did not want to be too sure about it. Although it seems to be a very deserving and meritorious case and we would like to give all widows a lump sum of five or ten thousand dollars, still, does not the gentleman thinks it might be setting a precedent that will lead to a large number of claims for similar reasons? If I understand this correctly, this is a precedent. This has never been done before.

Mr. PALMISANO. This is an exceptional case where a lieutenant left a wife and two children. Certainly, the widow cannot educate her two children on $60 a month. This was an exception, to pay the funeral charges and other expenses incurred.

Mr. PATMAN. This is to pay $5,000 extra?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is all; yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Considering the fact that a widow who lost her husband on the battlefield, while fighting for his country, can only receive $30 a month, does not the gentleman think that this lady, the widow of an employee of the fire department, is pretty well taken care of when she receives twice that much?

Mr. PALMISANO. Oh, the family of a man who is killed in the discharge of his duty, whether on the battlefield or whether in the District of Columbia, to my mind ought to have consideration. We have passed today a bill to take care of war orphans. We made special reference to that. We do that regularly. It seems to me in a case of this kind we ought to do something to permit this widow to educate her children. This is the only object of asking to pass this bill.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman will admit that it is establishing a precedent?

Mr. PALMISANO. I understand it is; yes.

Mr. PATMAN. When there are other cases just like this, where a man has been killed in the performance of his duty and his widow is receiving a pension of $60 a month, will the gentleman be for allowing a lump sum of $5,000 in each case?

Mr. PALMISANO. I think every case should stand on its own merits. If the circumstances in the case justify it, I would support it.

Mr. PATMAN. When did this death occur?

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not know. The gentleman from Texas knows.

Mr. PATMAN. No; I do not know or else I would not have asked the question.

Mr. PALMISANO. This bill has passed the Senate on one or two occasions. This man was killed in 1927.

Mr. PATMAN. Of course, I do not want to take the responsibility of depriving this widow of any sum of money. I presume that one should take that responsibility since it is a precedent that has never been set by this Government in any other case, but since I do not have all the facts I will give the committee reporting the bill the benefit of the doubt. It will probably call for all kinds of claims in the future. If we carry out this precedent, it occurs to me we will pay the widows of all employees in Government service or in the fire department or any other service at least $5,000. That is the precedent that is involved, the way I see it. If the gentleman wants to do it, I cannot stop him. One objection will not be sufficient, and I seem to be the only member of the committee questioning the wisdom of this payment.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not think this will set any precedent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Jennie Bruce Gallahan the sum of $5,000 as compensation for the death of her husband, Samuel L. Gallahan, late lieutenant, District of Columbia fire department, which occurred while he was engaged in the performance of his duties: Provided, That such sum shall be in addition to any payments heretofore or hereafter received from the policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, on account of such death.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROMOTION IN THE LINE OF THE NAVY

Mr. VINSON of Georgia submitted the following conference report on the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes.

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, and 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: On page 3, line 10, of the engrossed bill, strike out the following: "word 'hereafter'," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "words 'in 1934 and hereafter.'"

On page 3, line 13, of the engrossed bill, before the word "may", insert the following: "and whether they have since been married or not."

On page 4, line 3, of the engrossed bill, after the word "who", insert the following: "in 1934 and."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

On amendments nos. 1, 2, and 3: Provides for the retirement of officers in the grades of lieutenant and lieutenant (junior grade), who are not selected for promotion, as proposed by the House, instead of carrying officers in the grade of lieutenant, who are not selected for promotion, on the active list as extra numbers in grade, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments nos. 4 and 5: Extends from June 1, 1934, to August 1, 1934, the time in which appointments may be issued as ensigns to midshipmen graduating in 1933, not then commissioned and who may now qualify, as proposed by the Senate; also, corrects the text with respect to former midshipmen who have married and makes certain that all midshipmen of the class about to be graduated, as well as all future graduates, may be appointed as ensigns in the line of the Navy.

CARL VINSON,
P. H. DREWRY,
FRED A. BRITTEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report on the bill H.R. 9068.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the statement in lieu of the report.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD at this point the bill H.R. 9068 as agreed to in conference.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

H.R. 9068

An act to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That except as otherwise provided in this act, the provisions of existing law with reference to promotion by selection in the line of the Navy and the retirement of officers who are not on the promotion list or who are found not professionally qualified are hereby extended to include and authorize promotion to the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant, and the retirement of lieutenants and lieutenants (junior grade). The number to be recommended for promotion to each such grade and to be placed upon the promotion list shall be furnished the selection board for that grade by the Secretary of the Navy and shall be the number of existing vacancies in the grade concerned plus such additional number, if any, as the needs of the service may require.

SEC. 2. That lieutenants (junior grade) who on June 30 of the year of the convening of the board shall have had 3 years' service in the grade of junior lieutenant shall be eligible for consideration for selection for promotion to the next higher grade.

SEC. 3. That the board for the recommendation of line officers for promotion to the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant shall consist of nine officers on the active list of the line of the Navy above the rank of commander, not restricted by law to the performance of shore duty only, at least one of whom shall be a rear admiral.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of extending section 3 of the act of March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1483; U.S.C., Supp. VII, title 34, sec. 286a), to officers below the rank of lieutenant commander, the said section is amended so that the length of service therein prescribed shall be 14 years for lieutenants and 7 years for lieutenants (junior grade): Provided, That no officer of said rank shall become so ineligible prior to June 30 of the second calendar year following the date of this act: And provided further, That the restriction on the number of involuntary transfers in any fiscal year to the retired list prescribed in section 7 of the act of March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1484; U.S.C., Supp. VII, title 34, sec. 286e), shall not apply to the grade of lieutenant and lieutenant (junior grade).

SEC. 5. That section 1 of the act approved May 6, 1932 (47 Stat. 149; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 34, sec. 12), is hereby amended by inserting the words "in 1934 and hereafter" after the words "midshipmen who", and the words "Provided, That all former midshipmen graduated in 1933 who received a certificate of graduation and honorable discharge and whether they have since been married or not may, upon their own application, if physically qualified, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, be appointed as ensigns prior to August 1, 1934, by the President, and shall take rank next after the junior ensign appointed in 1933 and among themselves in accordance with their proficiency as shown by the order of merit at date of graduation: And provided further," after the words "Naval Academy", and by striking out "in 1932, and at least 50 percent of all graduates in subsequent years: Provided", so that as amended the said section will read as follows:

"That the President of the United States is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who in 1934 and hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy: Provided, That all former midshipmen graduated in 1933 who received a certificate of graduation and honorable discharge and whether they have since been married or not may, upon their own application, if physically qualified, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, be appointed as ensigns prior to August 1, 1934, by the President, and shall take rank next after the junior ensign appointed in 1933 and among themselves in accordance with their proficiency as shown by the order of merit at date of graduation: And provided further, That the number of such officers so appointed shall, while in excess of the total number of line officers otherwise authorized by law, be considered in excess of the number of officers in the grade of ensign as determined by any computation, and shall be excluded from any computation made for the purpose of determining the authorized number of line officers in any grade on the active list above the grade of lieutenant (junior grade) until the total number of line officers shall have been reduced below the number otherwise authorized by law."

SEC. 6. That hereafter any staff officer on the active list below the rank of lieutenant commander shall be advanced to the next higher rank in his corps when the running mate of such staff officer or an officer junior to such running mate has been promoted to that higher rank in the line of the Navy or when a vacancy in that rank exists in the line of the Navy which will in due course be filled by the promotion of his running mate or an officer junior to his running mate: Provided, That such staff officer is found qualified in accordance with law for such advancement. The provisions of law relating to the advancement of staff officers now embodied in sections 255, 321, and 348r (supp. VII) of title 34, United States Code, are hereby amended in accordance with this section.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes tomorrow after the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table and immediately following the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TERRELL].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—TAX ON PHILIPPINE COCONUT OIL (H.DOC. NO. 388)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Early in the present session of the Congress the Philippine Independence Act was passed. This act provided that after the inauguration of the new interim or commonwealth form of government of the Philippine Islands trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be as now provided by law. Certain exceptions, however, were made. One of these exceptions required levying on all coconut oil coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 448,000,000 pounds, the same rates of duty now collected by the United States on coconut oil imported from foreign countries.

It is, of course, wholly clear that the intent of the Congress by this provision was to exempt from import duty 448,000,000 pounds of coconut oil from the Philippines.

Later in the present session the Congress, in the revenue act, imposed a 3-cent-per-pound processing tax on coconut oil from the Philippines. This action was, of course, directly contrary to the intent of the provision in the independence act cited above.

During this same period the people of the Philippine Islands, through their legislature, accepted the provisions of the independence act on May 1, 1934.

There are three reasons why I request reconsideration by the Congress of the provision for a 3-cent-per-pound processing tax:

First. It is a withdrawal of an offer made by the Congress of the United States to the people of the Philippine Islands.

Second. Enforcement of this provision at this time will produce a serious condition among many thousands of families in the Philippine Islands.

Third. No effort has been made to work out some form of compromise which would be less unjust to the Philippine people and at the same time attain, even if more slowly, the object of helping the butter- and animal-fat industry in the United States.

I therefore request reconsideration of that provision of the revenue act which relates to coconut oil in order that the subject may be studied further between now and next January and in order that the spirit and intent of the independence act be more closely followed.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 28, 1934.

VETO MESSAGE—THE LATE BRIG. GEN. ROBERT H. DUNLAP (H.DOC. NO. 387)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H.R. 276, entitled "An act to authorize the placing of a bronze tablet bearing a replica of the Congressional Medal of Honor upon the grave of the late Brig. Gen. Robert H. Dunlap, United States Marine Corps, in the Arlington National Cemetery, Va."

The bill authorizes the placing of a bronze tablet bearing a replica of the Congressional Medal of Honor upon the grave of the late Brig. Gen. Robert H. Dunlap, United States Marine Corps, in the Arlington National Cemetery, without expense to the Government.

The existing regulations governing Arlington National Cemetery now permit replicas in bronze of decorations, such as the Congressional Medal of Honor, the Distinguished Service Cross, etc., to be placed within a sunken panel on monuments or headstones erected in Arlington National Cemetery. Bronze tablets to be placed on a grave itself are not authorized under existing regulations. As it is contemplated placing this tablet at no expense to the Government, the purpose desired could be obtained by adhering to the present regulations either by placing a bronze replica of the Medal of Honor in a sunken panel on the headstone now at the grave of Brigadier General Dunlap, or on a larger monument which may be erected at the grave at private expense in accordance with existing regulations.

The bill is objectionable, as it would establish a precedent and show discrimination against other individuals who have received this decoration and who are or may be interred in Arlington National Cemetery.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 25, 1934.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread upon the Journal.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message of the President and the accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LITERARY DIGEST POLL ON THE NEW DEAL

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, my reason for desiring to address the House at this time is to call attention to the manner under which the so-called "new deal" is being approved or disapproved in the Literary Digest poll being made public every week.

To my mind, and I have studied it rather carefully, I do not think there ever was a set-up so perfectly made in advance, so deliberate in its desire, so positive in its effect and results as the one that is being broadcast daily not only by the Literary Digest but by the newspapers of the world as evidence of the backing by the American people of the so-called "new deal." The words "new deal" are used constantly in the Literary Digest articles and are used constantly by the newspapers throughout the country; and, Mr. Speaker, when I say that there never was anything more deliberate, there never was anything more well-defined in advance than this vote on the new deal, I mean literally what I say. The matter was studied in advance for weeks and months, planned to accomplish a certain effect; and it is running true to form; it is accomplishing that effect.

I hold in my hand and show you some of the literature that is being sent out by the Literary Digest to influence the new-deal poll. It is subtle but well done. It has not been treated as if there were 2 candidates or 2 policies presented to the voters; that would be a fair way to obtain the impression of the American people toward the new deal. On the contrary, they send out this pamphlet bearing a fine picture of a handsome President, which no one would feel in the mood to discourage or to treat lightly. With that face on a letter you could accomplish almost anything [applause]; and that is the reason I say, Mr. Speaker, that this poll was so cunningly planned. Instead of mailing out a ballot which spoke for itself, the Digest propagandized the prospective voter with a picture of the President and a letter which in itself practically endorsed the new deal, whatever that might encompass. It was as unfair as the endorsement of but one candidate in an election poll.

The success of the new deal depends almost entirely upon the national approval of the National Industrial Recovery

Act. As N.R.A. stands for Gen. Hugh Johnson, his face should be published in the Digest propaganda and not the President, because, after all, Gen. Hugh Johnson and the N.R.A. are synonymous throughout the country. There is no division between them; they are one.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman is complaining on account of the tremendous popularity of the President and because his picture has been placed upon the pamphlet to which the gentleman refers. I grant the gentleman that the President's popularity will carry any proposition that is submitted to the people in his name today. [Applause.]

The gentleman says that General Johnson's picture should be on the pamphlet rather than that of the President because, he claims, that the President had nothing to do with it. I ask the gentleman, Who issued the Executive order under which General Johnson is acting?

Mr. BRITTEN. Aside from the issuance of the Executive order, the President does not know any more about these hundreds of codes than does the gentleman from Tennessee himself.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman from Illinois is entirely mistaken about that. The gentleman is making statements that are unsupported by any information he has.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is the gentleman asking me a question?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I am replying to complaints made by the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. I thought the gentleman from Tennessee desired to ask me a question; excuse me.

The truth of the matter is, of course, as the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee indicates, the President did sign these codes; but is there any Member in this House with sufficient gullibility to seriously suggest that the President read them? If he started to read the 435 or more codes, it would take him until a year from next summer to accomplish that feat alone, and then he could not possibly comprehend them. Their operations and effects are so varied.

There is no question but that General Johnson is the N.R.A., and the N.R.A. is General Johnson; and they started to crack up on him on yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, the price fixing, which, under N.R.A. codes has become so common, is not authorized by the terms of the National Industrial Recovery Act. The act provides merely that, when the President finds destructive wage or price cutting, he may issue licenses. The act does not say he may fix prices. On the contrary the Supreme Court has held that price fixing is an "unfair method of competition."

It is true that section 5 of title I of the N.I.R.A. gives temporary exemption from the provisions of the antitrust laws. But, Congress never intended, in granting this exemption, to authorize price fixing. On the contrary, Senator WAGNER, who sponsored the N.I.R.A. bill in the Senate, explained on June 8, 1933:

> I have reiterated on the floor two or three times, and it was stated any number of times in the committee, that prices shall not be fixed, because the fixing of prices is not in conformity with the preservation of fair competition.

So much for that. But there is more. The act specifically forbids monopolies. Monopolies, according to the Supreme Court, are not merely industrial concentrations. Monopolies are also restraint of trade "by means of every contract, combination, and so forth." It is, therefore, unreasonable to assume that Congress in the same act would forbid monopolies and authorize monopolies—that is, combinations under codes to fix prices and restrain trade.

The country is entitled to a clear explanation from the Government on this essential point of law. For if I am correct, not only is current price fixing in the codes illegal, but its beneficiaries are liable to full prosecution under the Sherman Act. However, the gentleman has accomplished his purpose; he has taken me away from my subject matter. [Laughter.]

> Your personal vote is critical and important.
> If the majority of the citizens of the United States believe in President Roosevelt's policies, then they should support these policies by a mighty vote of approval.

I wish the Digest would manage my campaign in Chicago next October. I think this is a work of art. If you approve of the President's policies, just put a cross in the square marked in front of the word "yes" and let it be a mighty vote of approval. That language is right under the President's picture.

In another accompanying pamphlet they go on and show pictures of the mighty employers of labor, and the mighty employers of money, who back the new deal. The first name on the list favoring the new deal is Walter C. Teagle, president of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey. Let us see what he says:

> It is apparent that President Roosevelt is feeling his way by trial and error to a more equitable distribution of the national income and more power to him. It is the only ultimate insurance of human welfare and community property.

Walter Teagall says that he is looking for an equitable distribution of the income of the country, and that is the wealth of the country. He certainly is looking for distribution of that income. He practices what he preaches. His Standard Oil Co. has raised the price of gasoline three times in the last 90 days. He is distributing the income and wealth by collecting it. Of course, the Standard Oil Co. is for the new deal, because it permits the company to fix prices throughout the United States to the detriment of the little oil producer. What do they care about the consumer, the little man on the street, or the farmer? Let them pay. What do they care about them. The gentleman from California has just shown me a Standard Oil bill coming up next week. I wish I had the time to read it. If I said anything about that bill now, it would be like the fellow in the White House, who signs all these codes without knowing what is in them. No human being could read all of them and know what is in the codes, because he would not live long enough.

The Standard Oil Co. is for this distribution of income, because the new deal permits them to promote their monopoly in violation of existing law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Will not 5 minutes be sufficient? I may say to the gentleman that we have some rules and election contests to take up this afternoon.

Mr. BRITTEN. I was told that the gentleman had but one bill, and was then going to quit. It is only 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. BYRNS. I shall have to object to 10 minutes. I am willing that the gentleman may have 5.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will go along as rapidly as I can. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. The next gentleman whose picture appears for new-deal endorsement and propaganda is Mr. Thomas Lamont, of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. Why would not Lamont be for the new deal? It would be absurd to suggest that he is not for the new deal. I should like to quote his language because it deals entirely with money, and the gold standard which he figures is still in doubt, but yet he is for the new deal.

> We (the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co.) have not opposed the present administration, but from the very start have cordially supported it. Immediately upon the withdrawal from the gold standard Mr. Morgan issued a public statement—a thing very rare for him to do—upholding the administration's declaration. Members of this firm have since made it clear upon many occasions that we regarded this step as having been of extraordinary benefit to the American people as a whole.

Then Charles M. Schwab, president of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, is shown here.

> We are all behind the President supporting him, of course. I can't flatter myself that I can read exactly how these innovations—so new to me and my experience in business—will turn out. I have always been an optimist. I am determined to continue an optimist, even though I don't pretend to be able to size up the wisdom or the unwisdom of all the novel experiments now being tried.

Why would not the big steel companies and the steel people generally be for the new deal? You would examine their heads for lunacy if they were not for the new deal.

Every nail that goes into a farmhouse, every piece of steel that is transported over the United States today moves under a price fixed by the Steel Corporation. It moves under a fixed price set by this tremendous monopoly in distinct violation of existing law.

Then there is Pierre S. du Pont, partner of John Raskob, and chairman of the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Corporation. Why would not Du Pont, with a thousand million back of him in corporation stocks, be for the new deal? He controls General Motors, and I may say also that there is a statement from a General Motors man that I shall refer to in a minute.

I went to Washington thinking that N.R.A. was an upsetting influence in business and in labor conditions. I confess that I have been completely converted. Everyone who goes to Washington learns very quickly the meaning of N.R.A. and becomes enthusiastic.

Of course these men are for the new deal, and everybody who reads their statements before putting a cross in front of "yes" or "no" is impressed by what they say, these great industrial magnates, these men who employ labor by the millions. The suggestion will be made in the press of the country that this poll being conducted by the Literary Digest shows a 2½ or 3 to 1 vote in favor of the President's new deal. [Applause.]

I know what you are applauding. You are applauding the trick that has been put across by the Literary Digest, and I do not blame you. I think it was a very clever piece of politics to send this into the home of an old maid, for instance. Do you think she would vote against anything that this handsome man [holding up a picture of President Roosevelt] sponsored or was apparently sponsoring? [Applause.]

When the Literary Digest printed these pictures of distinguished industrialists and distinguished politicians, you did not see Al Smith's picture included. We all know what he would say about the new deal. You do not see a statement from the distinguished former Senator from Missouri, Mr. Reed. You do not see his picture, and you did not see quoted his impression of the new deal. You did not see the picture of my distinguished friend on the other side of the Capitol, Senator CARTER GLASS, and his impressions of the new deal. They are not printed 15,000,000 times for the benefit of influencing judgment. Oh, no. You did not see anything about the gentleman whom the President himself selected to head a very important board in the N.R.A., Clarence Darrow.

I am told he has a very well-defined idea about this new deal and its manipulation and disastrous effect upon the little business man as well as the consumer.

You do not see anything in there from the Attorney General or from the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. HENNEY. Does the gentleman endorse Darrow's views?

Mr. BRITTEN. Where he refers to monopolies and price fixing; yes.

Mr. HENNEY. The gentleman is crying because he is not included there.

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I am not crying; I am laughing. This artful method of making people vote the way you want them to would make a horse laugh. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENNEY. The gentleman is referring to the wrong species.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; not now.

The fact of the matter is that under the new deal everybody knows—your Attorney General knows, your President knows, Gen. Hugh Johnson knows, your Federal Trade Commission knows—and they will admit it if questioned—that monopolies have been formed and are operating under a price-fixing code which is destructive of the little business man and destructive of the income of the consumer and is bound to crack up and ultimately destroy the Democratic Party. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the expected cracking-up of the N.R.A. was started today when Gen. Hugh Johnson was authorized by the President to suspend operations of such codes of the service trades and industries as he (Johnson) concluded were not adding to the public welfare or which were not meeting with success and approval of those trades and industries.

By the Executive order General Johnson himself is designated as the sole authority to decide which codes should be scrapped. The hundred or more code authorities now in Washington representing thousands of industries will not be called in to determine for themselves the wisdom of this action nor will they be consulted as to which of the industrial codes should be thrown into the wastebasket. They have not been consulted heretofore, and there is no reason why they should be consulted now.

The next step of the N.R.A. will be to announce that the steel, oil, and practically every other important code is operating in violation of the law in the direct promotion of monopolies which are not only destroying the smaller business man and industrialist but are working a great burden upon the American consumer and farmer.

The N.R.A. law distinctly provides against the setting-up of monopolies, and no one knows this better than the President himself, General Johnson, the Attorney General, and the Federal Trade Commission. Unless price-fixing monopolists are halted in their manipulation of prices and combinations in restraint of trade, I will introduce a resolution for a searching congressional investigation which will immediately prove beyond the slightest doubt that the N.R.A. is the direct cause of law violations never intended by Congress.

When I say that the President himself, General Johnson, the Attorney General, and the Federal Trade Commission agree that trade monopolies now exist in practically every line of trade endeavor, I know what I am talking about and that they will admit it when questioned.

I shall by congressional resolution call upon the Federal Trade Commission to perform its duty and advise Congress concerning the illegality of the price-fixing monopoly-making codes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to answer the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object to the gentleman having 5 minutes, but I should like to ask the majority leader what will be the program for the balance of the afternoon.

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to the gentleman that there are not going to be any more speeches by unanimous consent until we consider this election contest and the rule that the gentleman from New York is going to call up. I regret that the gentleman from Illinois saw fit to take this time, and I am not going to object to the gentleman from Texas having 5 minutes; but, so far as I am concerned, I think it is entirely unnecessary for the gentleman to answer the gentleman from Illinois, because the gentleman from Illinois, partisan Republican that he is, has made the best Democratic speech in behalf of the President and in favor of the election of a Democratic Congress in November that I have heard. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. If the statement made by the majority leader is correct, it is not necessary to take the time of the House to answer the speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the majority leader if he would be willing that I may have 5 minutes in order that I may explain something that is vital to the welfare of the Membership of the House, coming from the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. BYRNS. Will not my friend wait until we dispose of these other matters?

Mr. RICH. May I have the time later on in the day?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman can wait as well as these other matters; and following their disposition, I shall not object.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 5 minutes at such time this afternoon as may be designated by the majority leader.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can submit his request later.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas to proceed for 5 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the Republicans have a leader on the House floor, but they have no national leader in the United States, and this is what is bothering them. This is bothering the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] because he knows that the Literary Digest, when it has a poll, it is usually a correct one. It has proven itself in past history.

The gentleman now complains because, he says, "all of the old maids in the United States are for the present President." It is not merely the old maids—it is the young maids, it is the married women, it is the married men, it is the bachelors, it is the business men, it is the farmers, it is the men in the ditches, it is the men on the street, it is everybody for the President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and that is bothering the gentleman. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] cannot forget that when, in the public places, in the picture shows and theaters, the picture of his last President was thrown on the screen, smiles left the people's faces and they became blue and glum. There was not a bit of applause. But you let the present President's picture be thrown on the screen anywhere in the United States and you will hear loud applause in every picture house and public gathering in the United States. This is what is bothering the gentleman from Illinois and he cannot get over it. It is working on him.

Four hundred and thirty-five Members of the House could not agree on any code. Ninety-six Senators could not agree on any code. There is not a single code we could all agree upon. If left to ourselves we probably would have 435 different programs here in the House.

But President Franklin D. Roosevelt has one program. He is one man who has a definite policy. He is the man who is putting his policy and his program into effect to bring about economic recovery in this country. And we Democrats are backing him, whether we believe in some of his codes or not; we believe in him, and we have confidence in him.

I do not agree with lots of these codes, but I am following the President just the same. Some of these codes look ridiculous to me, but I am following the President just the same. Some of the codes may look ridiculous to some of my constituents, but if you take my constituents as a whole, they are for the President because he has a definite plan and a definite program, and they are behind the President in Kentucky and in Texas and in Illinois, and everywhere else in the United States. We may not like some of his codes, but we like our President. He will properly rectify the bad codes just as fast as he can reach them.

Why does not my friend from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], with all his astuteness, with all his skill and ability, with all of his experience as a legislator, why does he not quit his snarling and backbiting and get behind the President? Why does he not stand up with the rest of the people?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. What about the result of the primary in Illinois?

Mr. BLANTON. That evidenced President Roosevelt's popularity. We all like FRED BRITTEN, in spite of his faults. We seated him here the other day instead of a Democrat.

Mr. BRITTEN. And you are going to do it next January. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has made himself more popular this morning on both sides of the aisle by the frank admissions in his speech than anything else he has done since he has been a Member of Congress, because he shows exactly what the power of the President is when his picture is exhibited in the Literary Digest, as well as upon the screen in the theaters.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not much time, but I could not refuse to yield to my good friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. If the N.R.A. had done nothing else except to abolish child labor, to abolish the "yellow dog" contracts, giving labor the right to collective bargaining, they would have been worth while.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say this to my friend from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]—he would be mighty glad to have the Standard Oil Co. on his side of the aisle; he would be mighty glad to have this French Delaware corporation, whose name he could not pronounce, on his side of the aisle; he would be glad again to have have the Steel Trust on his side—he has had the Steel Trust ever since it was organized on his side—but these men now realize, together with all other business men, that they have followed you until you ruined some of them financially, and now they, along with all the workers, are for the President. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conference report on the bill H.R. 5884, the bankruptcy bill, be recommitted to the conferees in order to correct an error.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ELECTION CONTEST, SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND DISTRICT OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 296, the contested-election case of the Second District of Connecticut.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That William C. Fox is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Seventy-third Congress from the Second Congressional District of the State of Connecticut.

Resolved, That William L. Higgins is entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Seventy-third Congress from the Second Congressional District of the State of Connecticut.

The resolutions were agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF BREWSTER v. UTTERBACK

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 390, in the contested-election case of Brewster v. Utterback, of the Third Maine District.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That Ralph O. Brewster is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Seventy-third Congress from the Third Congressional District of the State of Maine; and further Resolved, That John G. Utterback is entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Seventy-third Congress from the Third Congressional District of the State of Maine.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

N.R.A. IMPROVEMENT OVER TRADE-PRACTICE CONFERENCES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a word about the difference between trade-practice conferences and the N.R.A.

Commencing in 1925, we had a Federal Trade Commission that refused to follow the law and adopted a policy that was contrary to the public interest. Before 1925 there had not been many trade-practice conferences because the different industries did not have the incentive to organize them. Beginning then, the Federal Trade Commission adopted the policy of letting the representatives of the different industries get together and organize themselves, even under the guidance and with the assistance of the Federal Trade Commission.

TRUST-FORMING ORGANIZATION

Such an organization resulted in the sky being the limit as to prices. It resulted in labor not being protected and it resulted in the destruction of independent business and in creating monopolies and trusts. There was nothing done at these conferences toward prohibiting child labor or controlling the hours of work. There were no provisions for minimum wages and maximum hours. I opposed the activities of the Federal Trade Commission in organizing, condoning, or permitting these conferences for the reasons I have just stated. I even went so far as to oppose the appropriations for the Federal Trade Commission when the bills came on the floor of this House. One time in December 1932, when I was fighting against an appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission that would further encourage these trade-practice conferences, I received information that as soon as the President-elect came into office in March 1933 he was going to change that; he was going to have something set up in the form of the N.R.A. that would protect the public, independent business, and labor, and such conferences would not be tolerated. After I was convinced it would take the place of the Federal Trade Commission, insofar as trade-practice conferences were concerned, I withdrew my opposition to the appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission because I did not want to interfere with the good work it was doing in other directions. The N.R.A. has been organized as it was contemplated. They have what may be termed "trade-practice conferences." They are called "conferences to agree upon a code."

LABOR, CONSUMERS, AND SMALL BUSINESS PROTECTED

Unlike the trade-practice conferences organized under the Republican administration, the public, labor, and independent business are protected under the codes. Instead of the sky being the limit as to prices, the consumer is protected. Instead of labor receiving nothing, the laboring man is protected now. Under the trade-practice conferences, industries were encouraged to organize monopolies and trusts. They cannot do that now. The independent is protected. So as between trade-practice conferences under the Republican administration, where there was no protection for labor, as was stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], where there was no protection for the consumer, where the sky was the limit as to prices, and where they were encouraged to organize monopolies and trusts in their own interests, and the N.R.A., which protects the consumer, which protects labor, which prohibits monopolies and encourages independent business, I am in favor of the N.R.A.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield for one observation?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am in hearty accord with what the gentleman has said. In West Virginia the coal industry has really been put back on its feet again by the N.R.A. It has been the salvation of that industry, both as to the employers and the employees.

Mr. PATMAN. Between 1925 and 1933, under a Republican Federal Trade Commission and a Republican administration, more than 100 large industries in this country were organized in trade-practice conferences, as I have outlined, and the public was absolutely unprotected. The N.R.A. is protecting those who were helpless under the Republican administration.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN N.R.A. AND TRADE-PRACTICE CONFERENCES UNDER REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION

Under the codes there are provisions against child labor, for minimum wages and maximum hours, allowing labor to bargain collectively, protecting consumers against exorbitant prices, protecting small business enterprises, and discouraging monopolies and trusts. Trade-practice conferences only helped the owners of the industry and disregarded the many benefits under the N.R.A. The representatives of an industry enforced the trade-practice rules, whereas under a code under the N.R.A. labor is protected by a labor advisory council, the consumers are protected by a consumers' advisory council, and the industry is protected by an industrial advisory council.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania 5 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not going to object to this request, but is it in order for the gentleman from Texas to yield for general debate on a proposition of this sort?

The SPEAKER. It is not the practice.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not going to object to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I want to call attention to the fact that general debate is not in order under a motion such as the gentleman from Texas has made.

Mr. SNELL. It certainly is not; and I am glad the gentleman has called attention to that fact. The rules ought to be complied with.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have 5 minutes after the conclusion of the bills now before the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not objecting to the gentleman from Pennsylvania addressing the House at this time.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, the Joint Committee on Printing advertised for bids for paper and envelops for the Federal Government for a period of 6 months or 1 year, beginning July 1, 1934. The reason for the request being for a 6-month to 1-year period was because the members of the committee really expected Congress to adjourn by July 1, and that would eliminate the necessity for their coming to Washington before January 1 next to renew contracts. The Public Printer also could function in doing the work necessary and could conduct his department in the best possible manner by having the supply of material furnished by contract.

The bids were to be opened Monday, May 21, 1934. The joint committee met on that date, and several members were notified by some of the bidders before entering the committee room that they were only permitted to bid for a 3-month period on account of the paper-code authority or N.R.A. not permitting a longer-period contract.

The Joint Committee on Printing then discussed the advisability of opening the bids on Monday, May 21, and after looking at the situation from all angles decided to notify the code authority of the paper industry and the N.R.A. that the Joint Committee on Printing wanted to secure contracts for at least 6 months to 1 year—at the request of the Printing Office. At this meeting the following resolution was adopted by the Joint Committee on Printing:

Whereas section 4 of the Printing Act of January 12, 1895, provides that the advertisements for paper proposals "shall specify the minimum portion of each quality of paper required for either 3 months, 6 months, or 1 year, as the Joint Committee on Printing may determine": Therefore, be it

Resolved, That in view of the apparent uncertainty among the paper trade as to whether the Joint Committee on Printing would consider proposals for furnishing paper for the public printing and binding for a term of 3 months beginning July 1, 1934, in accordance with the action taken by the paper-industry authority, instead of 6 months or 1 year, as advertised for by the Public Printer, in compliance with the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, the committee do now take a recess until 10 o'clock a.m., Friday, May 25, 1934, in order that all bidders whose sealed proposals have been received up to 10 o'clock a.m. on Monday, May 21, 1934, shall be given an opportunity to file a statement, if they so desire, that their respective proposals may be considered for a period of 6 months or 1 year, which was determined by the Joint Committee on Printing on April 26, 1934, under authority of section 4 of the Printing Act of January 12, 1895.

On Friday, May 25, the committee met; and I sat 3 hours listening to the opening of 50 bids, in which the prices were practically all uniform—the same. The length of time they were permitted to bid being 3 months, thus the Joint Committee on Printing had no bids for paper except for envelops, and the committee let the contract for this material for 1 year. There seems to be no restriction of time by N.R.A. on envelop paper.

Now, the situation is just this: That all the advertising is lost; all the work done by the committee was for naught.

as the N.R.A. would not permit the manufacturer to bid for more than 3 months, whereas the Joint Committee on Printing requested bids on a period of 6 months to 1 year. Therefore the law permitting the Joint Committee on Printing to function is violated by the N.R.A. They could not function according to law on account of N.R.A. The joint committee could not let contracts for 6 months as per their advertisement for bids, because the manufacturers were prohibited from submitting bids for a 6-month period or longer.

Would not the manufacturers be better off if they had work for 6 months or 1 year ahead on contract so they could in an orderly procedure conduct their business rather than compelling the Public Printer to purchase his requirements on the open market? This would cause the Government to do business in a disorderly fashion and contrary to good regulated business principles.

Is the N.R.A. cooperating with business or is it hindering it? Is the N.R.A. permitting the Government committees to function according to law or is the N.R.A. hindering the Joint Committee on Printing from functioning according to law? This I will let each Member of Congress ask himself.

Why not ask the N.R.A. to function for the best interests of the Government, the manufacturers, the laborers, and the taxpayers?

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9068) to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes.

ESTABLISHMENT AND OPERATION OF FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 381.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9322, a bill to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States to expedite and encourage commerce, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the words "thirty minutes" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hour."

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and four Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The doors were opened.

FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. O'CONNOR. This is a rule providing for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9322, known as the "free port" bill. For years we have heard about free ports. They are now called "foreign-trade zones." This bill provides for the establishment of free ports in the United States to be controlled by a commission made up of three Cabinet officers.

The rule provides for 1 hour of general debate. It is a wide-open rule, and the bill will be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It was represented to the Rules Committee that this bill had been reported from the Ways and Means Committee, that there was very little opposition to it; that for many years there has been a great deal of agitation throughout the country for the establishment of free ports in America. It was also represented to the Rules Committee that there were 41 free ports throughout the world; that the establishment of free ports or foreign-trade zones in this country would increase our foreign commerce, which is a thing we very much desire; that it would not interfere with the collection of customs duties, but on the other hand would afford an economy in their collection.

The policy established in the foreign-trade zone bill is one that has been advocated and endorsed for many years by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and practically all the leading chambers of commerce in the cities where there are ports. It has been endorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Secretary of Commerce. They have stated that the enactment of such a bill would aid the reestablishment of our foreign trade, that it would not interfere with our domestic manufacturers or with our domestic commerce, these being amply protected in the bill. Because of these representations, the Rules Committee saw fit to bring this measure out on the floor of the House as a piece of legislation which should be considered before Congress adjourns 2 months from now. [Laughter.]

A bill not entirely identical with this passed the Senate; but I understand the Committee on Ways and Means saw fit to report the House bill as more nearly meeting the situation than the Senate bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration, H.R. 9322, like its companion bill, S. 2001, is not new legislation. The latter bill passed the Senate unanimously.

Legislation having for its purpose the establishment and operation of foreign-trade zones within the ports of the United States has been before Congress for a great many years. It is not, therefore, either new or surprise legislation. To be exact, during the Sixty-fifth Congress, on May 3, 1918, the Senate Committee on Commerce referred to the Tariff Commission Senate bill 4153, which had the same purpose as the pending bill. The Tariff Commission made an exhaustive study of the matter. Hearings were held in San Francisco, Chicago, New York, New Orleans, Galveston, and other leading commercial and seaport cities of the United States. The Commission finally submitted a report to Congress, 6 months later. Their report is rather lengthy, but for the information of the Members present I shall read the concluding paragraph of that report:

After exhaustive study of foreign institutions and careful investigation of American conditions and mercantile opinion the Tariff Commission recommends the policy of permitting the establishment of free zones in American ports and endorses with certain suggested amendments the bill S. 4153 as shown in the print, analysis, comment, which follows.

That was in 1918. May I state that former President Hoover, while Secretary of Commerce, endorsed this policy. A few moments ago it was stated that the present Secretary of the Treasury endorsed the policy sought to be established by this bill. His predecessor, Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, gave his unqualified endorsement to this policy.

Mr. Speaker, for many years past I have been a stanch advocate of the policy of establishing foreign-trade zones in the United States. I have repeatedly introduced measures to bring this policy into being and have testified before committees of the House of Representatives in their behalf.

I presented the matter for consideration when the Tariff Act of 1930 was before the House of Representatives in the spring of 1929. While I have introduced bills to establish the policy since that time, I have not urged their consideration because of the economic conditions prevailing throughout the country. I did not feel that the various ports were in a position to assume the financial burden necessary to establish foreign-trade zones.

In the hearings held before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives when the Tariff Act of 1930 was under consideration I referred to a foreign-trade zone as a place, limited in extent, that differs from adjacent territory in being exempt from the customs laws as affecting goods destined for reexport; it means simply that, as regards customs duties, there is freedom unless and until goods enter the domestic market. A foreign-trade zone is an isolated, enclosed, and policed area in or adjacent to a port of entry, without resident population, furnished with the necessary facilities for lading and unlading, for supplying fuel and ship's stores, for storing goods and reshipping them by land and water; an area within which goods may be landed, stored, mixed, blended, repacked, and reshipped without payment of duties and without intervention of customs officials. It is separated from surrounding territory by a stockade. Goods cannot pass this stockade into the hands of the consuming public without undergoing customs revision and paying the full tariff duty.

One who has not been directly connected with international trade or marine problems can hardly appreciate the advantages which will accrue to American international commerce, as well as domestic labor and industry, from the establishment of foreign-trade zones in each and every port of the United States engaged in reexport business.

As I have stated before committees of this House, the establishment of foreign-trade zones will aid in better carrying out the principle of protection to American labor and industry;

It will encourage the investment of American capital in new industries;

It will employ American labor in work and enterprise now carried on in foreign countries;

It will develop American business in foreign markets and foreign trade;

It will build up centers in the United States for the distribution of the world's merchandise throughout the world;

It will simplify, facilitate, and cheapen the handling of exports and imports;

It will establish large transshipment points in the United States;

It will expedite the loading and unloading of ships;

It will aid in securing return cargoes for American vessels;

It will involve no change of principle not already well established, but merely of procedure; and

It will be a permissive law only.

The development of a consignment and transshipment trade by the use of foreign-trade zones will do much toward rehabilitating, developing, and maintaining our merchant marine. It will assist in restoring to the United States its position of leadership in international commerce.

With a limited number of natural harbors the ports of the United States have become of national importance. They are the gateways to the seven seas. Through them must pass all of the international trade of this vast Nation. The establishment and operation of foreign-trade zones in each of these ports is infinitely more far-reaching than local interest. Foreign-trade zones would have a beneficial influence over areas far greater than State boundaries. Their national importance gives the Federal Government an additional interest.

Because of this national significance of foreign-trade zones, I believe the present measure does not go far enough. I believe the Congress should authorize the establishment of foreign-trade zones as a public-works project, probably in accordance with the terms of the bill now under consideration. Foreign-trade zones so established would be self-liquidating and could be amortized over a period of years so that they would ultimately not cost the Federal Government a single penny. The financial burden of establishing zones, with its sacrifices due to high discount and interest rates, would not be imposed upon the ports and communities where the zones are established.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELCH. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman state how these zones are to be established and financed under this bill? I notice the word "corporation" is used. Are they to be private corporations?

Mr. WELCH. They will be financed by publicly owned ports, or by privately owned ports. As the gentleman perhaps knows, the great major ports of this country are publicly owned. A few are privately owned. So they would be financed, as I said, either by the State or municipalities owning the ports, or by private corporations which now own and control some of the ports of this country.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELCH. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman give a concrete example of how the free port will operate, taking any given commodity as an example; will he not explain how the system will work?

Mr. WELCH. I should like to comply with my colleague's request but my time will not permit going into the full details of how a free port operates.

While I personally favor the policy long established in the majority of our larger ports of governmental ownership and operation of port facilities as public utilities, I recognize the vested rights of private enterprise in some major ports. In those ports, however, as in publicly owned ports, foreign-trade zones should be operated as public utilities. The interest of the Federal Government, through Public Works financial assistance, would be a step in this direction.

However, the development of final policy in the operation of foreign-trade zones will come gradually through our experience in their operation. In establishing the principle by legislation of this character, we should be interested in safeguarding the heritage of all the American people, while at the same time developing a means for freer handling of international commerce and wider markets for American commodities.

Notwithstanding what I consider to be weaknesses in the present legislation, I shall vote for it, for the inherent principle is a definite and positive step in the right direction. Foreign-trade zones are necessary to the fullest development and employment of our resources, both in commodities, merchant marine, and labor, and their immediate authorization by the Congress will do much to assist in the restoration of normal international trade.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this measure. I anticipate it will pass the House, so I do not feel I am likely to convince anybody of the demerits of the bill. I realize that Members of the House from seaport sections are naturally in favor of any measure which will increase the commerce of their ports. It could not be otherwise. That is what this bill is designed to do, namely, aid in the local sale of foreign-made goods, and nothing else.

I was asked a moment ago by a Member to give an illustration of how this bill would work. I use this as an example: Supposing that there is a desire to purchase a thousand yards of some kind of cloth. The cloth may be made in this country. A similar cloth is made abroad. If the American-made goods are offered in competition with the foreign-made goods, it is fair to assume that the question of time of delivery would be extremely important. The American manufacturer can deliver his goods within a reasonable time. Possibly they are in his warehouse at the time the customer is looking for the goods.

The man offering the foreign goods must place the order for the goods and have them shipped to this country, thereby incurring considerable delay. But if this bill is passed the foreign-made goods stand on a parity with the American-made goods because of the creation of this zone. You fence the zone in and employ a lot of people to watch that no trespassing is done, and so forth; but the goods are shipped to this country to await sale. If not sold within 2 years then they are auctioned off, under the provisions of the bill. Consequently I do not hesitate to say that this bill follows the Democratic program that we have heard here for some little time of favoring foreign producers. We passed a reciprocal-tariff bill without any information about the kind of reciprocity that would be put into practice. Now we are asked in addition to that to set up a little market place where goods may be sold which are not consigned to a purchaser.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am certain that the gentleman recognizes the amendment adopted in the committee prohibiting the exhibition of the goods.

Mr. TREADWAY. They cannot be exhibited, but let me cover that matter. I grant the word "exhibit" has been put in there. However, assuming that I am the agent of a foreign manufacturer, I can have in my office in New York City a sample card book, as all dealers do. Those goods are not being exhibited. I have a right to have those samples, and I can say to you as my customer: "Mr. VINSON, I can deliver these goods to you the moment the duties are paid on them because I have them right here in this zone warehouse."

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If they are sold and removed from the foreign-trade zone they must pay the full tariff duty.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not saying that the Government does not get the duty. That is perfectly all right. We get the duty, but we do favor the foreign manufacturer by having the goods available for immediate delivery.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will he have to pay for storage in this warehouse?

Mr. TREADWAY. The question was asked a moment ago, Who was going to pay the bill? That is another serious objection to the bill. I suppose the importer will pay the bill, but it will require, in order to complete properly the setting up of these inland ports of entry and the zone adopted in inland cities, a very large expense, not alone to the actual owners of the goods but likewise to the Government itself, because it means the adding of just that many more employees on the part of the Government. Of course, additional employees mean additional Democratic officeholders.

May I say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK] and I were neighbors in Massachusetts. He was born in the next town to where I was born and where I have always lived. I have never had an opportunity to bring this up on the floor, but I am sorry that the gentleman from New York in his youth did not imbibe a little more of our good old Republican doctrine before he moved down to New York State.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I believe in a fair protective tariff. For this reason, I wanted to ask how they could compete with the American-made goods when they would have to pay for the storage and also the duty.

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course, we all recognize that 9 times out of 10 the foreign goods can be made much cheaper than our goods, in view of the wages paid by the manufacturers abroad, so that they can well afford to pay this storage.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am against bringing anything into this country without paying a fair tariff.

Mr. TREADWAY. After all, I am glad to see my good friend did imbibe some good principles before he left Massachusetts.

Mr. BLANTON. I have been wondering how our friend from New York so well outlived the environment of that earlier association.

Mr. TREADWAY. He left there pretty young, but you can see it lasted and still shows in his good judgment.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. May I ask the gentleman more particularly about the facilities that will be provided? Do I understand that the Government has to erect these warehouses at each one of these ports?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is my impression that is left to the applicants for the privileges. I think the property has to be furnished by somebody interested in the sale of these goods. This brings up another very interesting question.

All these port facilities are to a certain extent adjoining valuable land. Somebody must have some land they want to sell to the people that are setting up these zones. I do not know anything about that or who they are, but somebody is going to benefit in real-estate transactions by the passage of this bill.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield for a short question.

Mr. EVANS. Further answering the gentleman from Pennsylvania, may I say that in this bill the Government furnishes nothing except supervision. It furnishes no land or facilities in the way of physical property.

Mr. WELCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I should like to talk on the bill.

Mr. WELCH. I know the gentleman wants to be fair. When the gentleman asserts that someone has land to sell——

Mr. TREADWAY. I did not assert it. I thought it, and I still think so.

Mr. WELCH. Nearly all of the ports in the United States are owned and controlled either by cities or by municipalities. The cities and municipalities own the land; so they are not going to sell it to themselves.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is plenty of privately owned land.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. In the case of Los Angeles, the city owns 2,000 acres of harbor land; and such a harbor proposition would increase the revenue of the city.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is good. I am pleased that there is some benefit in that way.

Mr. WELCH. And every port on the Pacific coast is in the same position.

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me call your attention to the way this bill is before us. I think it was 16 or 17 years ago that a Member from California, Mr. Kent, brought in the free-zone proposition. It has been hanging around the doors of Congress a good deal of the time since then. When this bill was referred to a subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee in this Congress, it was reported favorably. We had some conferences in the committee—one I recall, where I asked if it would not be possible to take time enough to hear from the Tariff Commission on the subject; and the Democratic members were so anxious to immediately get the bill passed that we would not even send downtown and get Mr. Page, Vice Chairman of the Tariff Commission, here to tell us about it. The reason for that, Mr. Speaker, is the Tariff Commission——

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to interrupt the gentleman, but he has just said something about hearings. There were hearings other than those held at this session. We had extensive hearings during the last session of the Congress and Mr. Page appeared before the committee at that time.

Mr. TREADWAY. And he told you at that time there was no reason to pass the bill, and that was a very good reason for your not wanting to hear him this year.

Mr. CULLEN. No; he did not do that. He simply appeared before the committee and expressed his opinion. He was not opposing the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. He did not favor it.

Mr. CULLEN. As a matter of fact, the Tariff Commission approved the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. No. It was distinctly stated there was no need of it. The Secretary of Commerce did not favor the bill.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman has brought out the point about quick delivery and furnishing storage for that purpose. This is dangerous to the manufacturer; but I should like to ask the gentleman about the word "assembled" which appears in the measure. If a manufacturer here has part of the goods necessary, but has to buy other parts in order to complete the manufacture, under this bill he can bring parts from foreign nations and have the goods carried to this free port and assemble them there and in this way practically put out of business the manufacturer here.

Mr. TREADWAY. The language in section 3——

Mr. GIFFORD. That section provides they can be assembled not only to foreign parts, but domestic parts and the parts that heretofore have been purchased in this country will be replaced by foreign parts so the article can be sold cheaper.

Mr. TREADWAY. Here is what can be done. The language of section 3 is, "may not be manufactured or exhibited"—you cannot take foreign material and make it up——

Mr. GIFFORD. But it uses the word "assembled."

Mr. McFADDEN. If the gentleman will yield further there, I want to call attention to the fact that these foreign goods stored in these warehouses in the United States under present law can be financed with Federal Reserve credit at a low discount rate, which at the present time is one-fourth of 1 percent or one-half of 1 percent, and I submit this is unfair to American industry.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman for that information.

Here is what is provided in section 3:

> And may not be manufactured or exhibited in such zone, but may be stored, broken up, repacked, assembled, distributed, sorted, graded, cleaned, mixed with foreign or domestic merchandise, or otherwise manipulated.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is the point—mixed with foreign or domestic merchandise.

Mr. TREADWAY. Or otherwise manipulated. Perhaps the advocates of this bill can tell us what is meant by "otherwise manipulated." It goes about the limit.

Mr. WELCH. Is not that permitted under the Tariff Act of 1930, which the gentleman helped to frame?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think anything in the nature of a drawback is all right.

Mr. WELCH. And the language with respect to mixtures to which the gentleman has referred exists in the present tariff act which the gentleman helped to frame.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have very little time, and I must refuse to yield further. The gentleman does not need to argue the matter with me further. We are on opposite sides on the merits of the bill. There is no question but what you can practically lose the identity of the foreign goods under this language. Therefore I insist you cannot be more unfair to the American manufacturer than by giving the foreigner this benefit with respect to competition.

This is right along the usual line of the desire and the effort in this present Congress to favor the foreigner over the American producer, and I am not for that type of legislation and never have been.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I am looking for information. I do not know whether I am going to be for this bill or against it, but I cannot see now how this bill is going to help a single American manufacturer. Does the gentleman know how it will do this?

Mr. TREADWAY. On the contrary, it puts the American manufacturer at an extreme disadvantage.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. If the gentleman will yield for a further question, under the laws governing the Federal Reserve banks and in conformity with what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has just said, foreign commercial paper is discounted in the Federal Reserve banks, which means that the taxpayers and the people of the United States will now be financing all these foreign shipments of goods into the United States at the low rate of one twenty-sixth of 1 percent.

Mr. TREADWAY. I should think after the statement the gentleman has just made, he would know how he is going to vote with respect to this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I am asking this for the benefit of the other fellow, too.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, there are several other features I desire to speak of, but we have consumed practically all the time allowed under the rule. I think it would be well to adopt the rule and then have the debate later on.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNERY. I have had an open mind on the bill, but after the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and the questions asked him I am going to vote "no." The President discovered only yesterday or the day before along the lines of what the gentleman from Massachusetts said that we are in great danger from foreign imports, so much so that he has used his power given in the N.R.A. to put an additional tax on Japanese rugs.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would it not be desirable to do the same thing on shoes?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. As the gentleman from Massachusetts said, if you have a mingling of domestic and foreign articles it would ruin the American manufacturer.

Mr. TREADWAY. Take the Czechoslovakian shoes. They can bring them in to the free zone, take samples to Lynn, and sell those shoes out of that free zone.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] jump so quickly to a conclusion. I am afraid that my friend does not realize that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has not pointed out anything in the bill that is not in the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, referring to assembling and mixing.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] says that by the passage of this bill we give the power to assemble and manipulate, and so forth. There is nothing in that that is not contained in the tariff law passed in 1930, which the gentleman from Massachusetts helped to draft. That bill now exists, and goods are coming into bonded warehouses under it.

Every time a bill comes in my friend here raises the political flag. I greatly respect the gentleman from Massachusetts, and have a high regard for him personally, but he should not overlook the fact that distinguished members of his party have tried to bring about its passage in the past. This is not a Democratic measure. It is supported by members of both parties.

This bill comes in here, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] takes the floor, and what does he say? He says it is the usual Democratic program to favor the foreign manufacturer. That is incorrect. There are no tangible facts to support such a statement. The Boston Chamber of Commerce favors it. The maritime association of Boston favors it—both located in Massachusetts. From my experience and knowledge, 90 percent of the members of these organizations are not Democrats, although they are both fine organizations.

It is easy to make general statements, but one should take the floor and give the facts honestly, disinterestedly, and impersonally. If a Member is opposed to a bill, he should fight it, and fight it upon its merits, without taking the floor and simply saying, "This is injurious to the American manufacturer." My friend is trying to raise another political issue with reference to a bill which is not connected with any particular party. As a matter of fact, distinguished members of the Republican Party were those who first conceived this legislation, and members of the Democratic Party joined with them, as the result of which this bill is now before the House. This does not create any new law with reference to manipulation, assembling or anything of that kind. This prohibits manufacturing, because we do not want manufacturing in the foreign-trade zones entering into competition with our domestic manufactures. We specifically protected our American manufacturers and we provided that there shall be no exhibition within a foreign-trade zone, to protect further our American manufacturers; and my friend from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY, knows that.

There is one more thought that I want to leave. Mr. TREADWAY talks about conservative Republicans. I respect them. I respect the rights of all schools of thought which operate within the law. We want the progressive school. We do not want the radical school; but they are entitled to their thought, as long as they stay within the Consitution and the law. I admire conservatism. I like to consider myself a progressive, but I do not like to see my friend take the floor and then try to create a party issue, when, as a matter of fact, the real credit belongs to members of both parties rather than to members of any one party.

I hope the rule will be adopted, and then we can debate this question further when it comes up for consideration in the committee. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill authorizes the creation, operation, and maintenance of free-trade zones at ports of entry in the United States. This bill was given very careful consideration by the Ways and Means Committee. Hearings were conducted by a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means. Later the full committee gave very careful consideration to the proposed legislation. It has the support of a large majority of that committee, not only members of the majority but several members of the minority. It also has the support of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, also the support of his distinguished predecessor. It has the support also of the Secretary of Commerce. It has the support of the American Chamber of Commerce. It has the support of practically all business organizations of the country. In fact, it has the support of all who know most about it, and is opposed by those who know least about it.

It also has the support of the Tariff Commission of the United States, a nonpartisan organization. The fact is there is no partisanship whatever in this legislation. The idea of trying to raise the red flag of partisanship in the discussion here shows to me very conclusively the bankrupt condition of those who are opposing this legislation. If I were in the place of those who are so vigorously opposing this legislation, I would first go to those of my own household to see if I could not convince them.

I know there are still men in this House, both Republicans and Democrats, whose patriotism rises above partisanship, and they are anxious to see the business of this country resuscitated and put on its feet again. In order to do that, they think it is best to follow the enlightened judgment of men who know most about legislation of this kind and pay little attention to those who know least about legislation of this character. [Applause.]

Its passage will aid industry and labor. It will also aid our international trade and should receive the unanimous support of the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the the table.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9322) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9322, with Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, if there is one thing that I enjoy more than another in this House it is to see my distinguished brother, TREADWAY, take the floor on matters of legislation. He is really appealing. He rather gets under your skin with the serious way that he starts to explain bills; and then, when there is a suggestion of anything in relation to tariff or free trade, Brother TREADWAY is right at home.

The gentleman knows just as well as I do that there is not the suggestion of tariff, not the suggestion of interference with American manufacturers, not the suggestion of free trade within this bill; but simply because of the fact that the bill establishes these free foreign-trade zones, my friend TREADWAY wants to leave the impression on the Membership of the House: "Look out for it; you are going to get caught here somewhere; Europe is going to flood us with a lot of their manufactures; the American manufacturer is going to be destroyed!"

Of course, nobody who has real, good, ordinary, common sense in regard to this matter and who has read this bill thoroughly thinks there is any suggestion of that kind, but, on the contrary, is completely convinced that there is not such a suggestion within the four corners of the bill.

Now, let us see what the bill does and let us see how a free zone is defined. It is not a new thing, but has been before Congress off and on for the last 20 years.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. HOLMES. All goods which are imported at the present time have to go into a bonded warehouse, and they cannot be taken out of this warehouse until the duties are paid.

Mr. CULLEN. But the importer or the shipper has to pay the expense of having the goods held in the warehouse under bond.

Mr. HOLMES. Of course, he has got to pay what they call storage on them.

Mr. McCORMACK. And under the operation of the foreign-trade zones as provided in this bill the importer or the shipper will have to pay the expense of the operation of the foreign trade zone.

Mr. HOLMES. But it comes into the free zone without any kind of expense.

Mr. CULLEN. It comes into the free zone without duty, but the expense of organizing and operating the free zone has to be met by those who use its facilities, whether the free zone be operated by a municipality or by a private corporation.

Mr. HOLMES. The reason I raise this point is because in past years European countries have dumped steel into the warehouses of Boston, landed there duty paid and freight paid for $1 a hundred pounds; and the best we can do in these same warehouses on American steel from Pittsburgh, Detroit, or Chicago, or anywhere else in this country is $2 a hundred base.

Now, will the free zones make it possible for foreign steel manufacturers to dump an unlimited amount of their steel into these ports for the consumption of the people of the United States in competition with domestically manufacured steel?

Mr. CULLEN. That most certainly is not the intention of the bill.

Mr. HOLMES. That is the point that bothers me in the consideration of the establishment of free zones.

Mr. CULLEN. Similar bills have been before Congress for many years. H.R. 9322 is a bill authorizing the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in the ports of entry of the United States to expedite and encourage foreign commerce.

Similar bills have been before Congress for the past several years, and a great deal of information has been submitted at public hearings at different times. In 1919 the Tariff Commission made a very thorough investigation and study of this subject, and in their statement submitted to Congress stated in part as follows:

> After exhaustive study of foreign institutions and careful investigation of American conditions and mercantile opinion, the Tariff Commission recommends the policy of permitting the establishment of free zones in American ports.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman state just who is going to benefit through the passage of this bill?

Mr. CULLEN. It will benefit the unemployed; it will benefit our shipping, which is absolutely paralyzed today; and it will bring into the country much more commerce, because we lack this type of zone which is provided in 41 cities in Europe today.

During the hearings on March 6 and 7 of this year there appeared many witnesses, all of whom were in favor of the establishment of such zones. Among the organizations favorably commending the proposed legislation are the following: Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the Port of New York Authority, the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, the Merchants' Association of the City of New York, the Maritime Association and Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Philadelphia Board of Trade, the Baltimore Association of Commerce, the Export and Import Bureau of Baltimore, the New Orleans Association of Commerce, the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, the Chicago Association of Commerce, the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, the Pacific American Steamship Association, and the Ship Owners' Association of the Pacific Coast, the Trade Association of Hampton Roads and Norfolk, the Chamber of Commerce of Jersey City, and also the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. BURNHAM. Will not the gentleman add to his list the city of San Diego? The people of that city are tremendously interested in this bill and in its passage.

Mr. CULLEN. I am very glad to have the city of San Diego join in support of such a worthy project.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman should also add to his list the names of the cities of Beacon and Poughkeepsie in his own State.

Mr. CULLEN. Yes. I thank my colleague from New York for mentioning these cities. I may say I am advised with respect to the city of Beacon, with the founding of which I had something to do years ago.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. I could see where there will be a tremendous advantage to foreign products coming into this country were this bill adopted; they would have an advantage; but I fail to see anything in the bill which would be of advantage to American interests. I am asking for information.

Mr. CULLEN. The gentleman does not see any advantage that is coming to American manufacturers?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. CULLEN. It is not going to hurt American manufacturers.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will it not result in an increase of imported products laid down on the shores of this country?

Mr. CULLEN. Not to the disadvantage of domestic commerce.

Mr. BOILEAU. It will be of advantage to importers.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. One of the major benefits will be in the transshipment of goods. I think there is a misapprehension as to what can be done under this bill. Under the present tariff law foreign goods can enter this country; and if they are mixed, mingled, or manipulated and then exported from the country, there is a drawback of the tariff. Consequently the same thing that would be done under the pending bill is already being done under existing law.

Mr. BOILEAU. But this bill will provide the added advantage of warehouse facilities.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want to emphasize that it is the maritime branch of the Boston Chamber of Commerce that is interested. There is no question as to their feeling in the matter.

I was glad to hear the gentleman from Kentucky mention "drawback." The passage of this bill would aid merchants inasmuch as it is troublesome to get the drawback, and sometimes they have to wait a long time to get it. But I want to ask the gentleman from New York whether the passage of this bill will not encourage and increase the importation of foreign goods from the obvious advantage which would be enjoyed through having goods right on our shores ready for immediate delivery?

Mr. CULLEN. Not any more than it does today.

Mr. GIFFORD. I cannot see that.

Mr. CULLEN. I refuse to yield further.

Mr. WELCH. My statement was that it was a warehouse for goods in transit, not a warehouse for foreign goods.

Mr. CULLEN. In view of the fact that considerable misunderstanding has prevailed in the past regarding foreign-trade zones, I shall take a few moments on this phase of the subject.

The establishment of such zones in the ports of entry of the United States will in no way interfere with or change existing tariffs, and is in no way an entering wedge for the dumping of foreign products in competition with our domestic products. At this point I desire to quote from the report of the Tariff Commission defining such zones and the purposes and functions of the same. The Tariff Commission's definition is as follows:

A free port or free zone is a place, limited in extent, that differs from adjacent territory in being exempt from the customs laws as affecting goods destined for reexport; it means simply that, as regards customs dealers, there is freedom, unless and until imported goods enter the domestic market. * * * The purpose of the free zone is to encourage and expedite that part of a nation's foreign trade which its government wishes to free from the restrictions necessitated by customs duties. In other words, it aims to foster the dealing in foreign goods that are imported, not for domestic consumption but for reexport to foreign markets, and for conditioning or for combining with domestic products previous to export.

This should, in my opinion, dissipate any fears that the creation of such zones will in any way adversely affect our domestic markets, or enable foreign products to avoid our tariff levies and compete with domestic products.

In this connection I want to quote from a letter written by Mr. Harriman, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which is incorporated in the report on this bill. Mr. Harriman, referring to foreign trade zones, says:

The chambers of commerce and trade associations comprising our membership have, for many years, advocated that there should be legislative permission for the creation of such facilities in American ports. It has been our feeling that foreign-trade zones will contribute to the expansion of our international trade, particularly transshipment trade, to the supplying of additional cargoes for our American merchant marine and for the simplification of customs administration. * * * It is believed that a free zone is a part of the equipment of a country for doing a diversified international trading business which American business men ought to have made available to them. It is believed that with free zones in American ports the American merchant marine will benefit from an increased share in the carrying trade of the world; that American merchants and manufacturers will benefit in a variety of ways from the advantages of a wide American consignment market for foreign products; that the free zones will bring needed improvements in American port and terminal facilities; that the free zones will bring added business to American banks, insurance companies, freight forwarders, and warehousemen; that free zones will bring about a vast improvement of the type of facilities provided at present only by bonded warehouses and drawbacks together with a simplification and saving in the work of customs administration.

That which I have just quoted is what the proponents of this legislation are seeking, and is what I believe every Member of this House should be in favor of. The creation of these trade zones will have a most beneficial effect on our shipping industry, which at the present time is practically paralyzed and lying idle and rusting away for want of cargoes. Any aid that will come to our merchant marine by the passage of this legislation will be of inestimable value from the standpoint of national defense. We all vividly recall the condition we found ourselves in during the World War, and the millions and millions of dollars we were required to expend because of the lack of a mere semblance of an adequate merchant marine.

Now, after we have again placed the American flag on the high seas at such tremendous cost, are we to allow again our merchant marine to distintegrate to a condition similar to that prior to the World War, or are we to extend such aid as is possible and such as is provided in this bill? Other countries have extended similar aid to their shipping and other interests by recognizing the principle of foreign-trade zones. There are 41 such zones in various parts of Europe, and they have been of material aid in the handling of additional tonnage in the ports where located.

Not only that, but this legislation has received endorsement from every commercial body in the United States. Practically nobody opposes it. Nobody that I know of opposes this bill except the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLARD. If it is such a good bill, why has it taken 20 years to pass?

Mr. CULLEN. The bills that were introduced in the prior sessions of Congress were not pressed with any degree of seriousness. They were introduced as a matter of suggestion, but from one thing grows another. From an acorn large oaks grow. The suggestion came, and hence the bill is before you now because of the fact the people of the country realize this is important legislation and we should have it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In the bills which were considered in prior Congresses there was the authority to manufacture within the foreign-trade zone. Unquestionably this would give an advantage over the manufacturers of similar products in the interior of this country and that character of bill should not be enacted into legislation. The manufacturing end of it and the authority to manufacture are striken from the bill. We have gone so far as to strike the exhibition of goods from the bill.

Mr. CULLEN. Yes; that was taken out.

Mr. McCORMACK. We prohibit the manufacture of goods within this zone.

Mr. CULLEN. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] bears down on the inclusion of the word "exhibit." Will the gentleman claim that a man endeavoring to sell foreign goods could not have a sample in his office from which he could sell?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] if he thinks the business men of the world, even though they are foreign-business men, are going to go to the expense of manufacturing goods and shipping them blindly out into the ports of the world in the hope that they may be able to sell the goods?

Mr. TREADWAY. I absolutely think they will because there is sure to be a sale of the goods in 2 years' time under this bill.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What benefit would the foreign manufacturer get if they are abandoned and sold under auction? They certainly would do nothing except suffer loss.

Mr. CULLEN. My time is being used up. I refuse to yield further.

The passage of this bill will, in my judgment, also mean a saving of considerable Customs Service expense to the Government, as well as annoyance, delay, and expense to shippers and domestic industries.

The enactment of this legislation does not call for the expenditure of any public funds, but merely authorizes States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, or other public agencies to establish, operate, and maintain such zones. Private corporations are authorized to establish such zones only in the case such zones are not established by the States or other public agencies, with a further limitation that they must be chartered by the State legislature. The cost of maintaining whatever additional customs services as may be required in these zones is to be borne by the operators of such zones.

The Secretary of the Treasury, as also the Secretary of Commerce, have signified their approval of the establishment of these zones, as evidenced by their letters which are incorporated in the report, and as this legislation will inevitably encourage our foreign commerce and be of inestimable benefit to many of our domestic industries, I feel the same should meet with the unanimous approval of the membership of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the distinguished gentleman from New York and to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], and the other speakers, but I am a little bit leery of this bill. I am a little suspicious of it. I have listened to all the talk about the free zones and free ports and where the cities are going to build up free ports and all about foreign goods coming into the United States and into these free ports, where the goods wait until an American customer comes along to buy the goods. Then after a certain period of time, if the goods are not sold, they are auctioned off.

The first thought that occurs to me is that you will have a surplus of goods. You are creating a condition of surplus of goods on hand in a free zone which is a threatened competition to the same type of goods in the United States. True, you are not allowing them to put the goods on exhibition where the American can go in and look at the goods and see whether they are as good-looking a shoe, for instance, as is made in the city of Lynn, Mass., and if they are as good looking as the shoes from Lynn they may be bought at a cheaper price. I know my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CULLEN] does not want to throw the shoe workers of Lynn, Mass., out of employment, for instance, but before we had a tariff on shoes there were some 6,000,000 pairs of Czechoslovakian shoes coming into the United States every year. We had the same situation in reference to textiles and a lot of other manufactured products of the United States.

As to shipping, I can see where anyone who comes from a seaport would be inclined to favor this bill. Lynn, where I live, is a seaport city. We have just had our harbor deepened. Boston is 10 miles from Lynn and is a great port. The idea supposedly here is to help American shipping, which sounds fine, but these goods are not going to be carried in American ships. They will be carried in English, German, Argentine, French, and other ships.

When the United States Government saw fit to enter into negotiations for Brazilian coffee in exchange for some other articles, the coffee was carried up here in Brazilian ships, and the other products shipped back in Brazilian ships, not American ships. I brought this fact out on the floor of the House at that time. So you need not worry about building up the American merchant marine. It will not be done in this manner because the foreign governments take better care of their shipping than we do. These goods will be shipped in foreign ships. They have control of the ocean, and they intend to keep control.

I am also suspicious when they say the United States Chamber of Commerce and Mr. Harriman are in favor of this bill. Mr. CULLEN says this is going to inure to the benefit of labor. Mr. Harriman appeared last year before the Committee on Labor. I have nothing against the gentleman and have no antagonistic feelings toward him personally. He is a fine gentleman with a good character, but with very little sympathy for the shoe workers of Lynn, or the textile workers of Lawrence, or other men who toil with their hands.

I am suspicious that this bill is another move of the international bankers to protect their interests at the expense of the American workers. The importers and international bankers work pretty well in double harness. The original bill, I understand, would actually have permitted manufacturing in these free zones. Then it would have permitted exhibitions of the goods. That would be almost as good as letting in the goods duty free. It seems to me that for the safety of the American workers and their protection against foreign competition of low wages and long hours this bill should be defeated, and I am against the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER].

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, you perhaps do not know it, but there is a free port within a stone's throw of the confines of the United States right below my State. Right across the border from San Diego, from where my good friend and colleague from California [Mr. BURNHAM] comes, the Mexican Government, which, I suppose would be considered by us more backward than our own, has established a free port at Tia Juana, and they have established the kind of free port where they permit not only the importation of foreign goods to be repacked and rehandled, and so forth, but they also permit such goods to be manufactured in this free port and free zone. There is an island, so to speak, there that is fenced about with a high fence with barbed wire on top, and they invite, today, the American manufacturer of southern California to come down into this free zone and fabricate their goods, using foreign labor.

What do you suppose the industrialists of San Diego can do against this sort of competition? There are over 41 free zones established in the world, and one of them is right there at the border of southern California, at Tia Juana, Mexico.

I am in sympathy with this bill. I am supporting it because my suspicion is it will encourage the American merchant marine; because my suspicion is that wherever these free zones are established, it will add some employment from the army of unemployed today. I am in thorough sympathy with this bill and want to see it pass.

You may say I am a port-town Member of Congress. This may be true. While I do not represent the district within which is the port of Los Angeles, nevertheless, if I were from Iowa, or if I were from the State of Michigan, I would not object to this bill, and I am sorry to hear my friend and colleague from Michigan state that he feels he will have to oppose the measure, because it will not be long before along the Canadian border there will be established by the Canadian Government free zones, inviting American manufacturers to come in these zones and manufacture and fabricate their goods and buy foreign basic products and put them up and sell them in the United States. In this bill we have safeguarded against this. We only provide that these foreign goods can be brought into this free zone and repacked, rehandled, cleaned, and manipulated; and manipulated, if you will look at the derivation of that word, means handled by the hands. Manus, I believe, is the Latin word for hand, and manipulating means just exactly what it says, that it shall be repacked or rehandled, which is just another similar expression.

So I am supporting this measure and I hope it passes. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to go on record in favor of this legislation. Two of the cities in my district, Poughkeepsie and Beacon, on the Hudson River, have made a very careful study of the free-zone proposition and the business men there are almost unanimously in favor of it. I can see many advantages and but few disadvantages from the passage of this bill.

I am not very much concerned, however, about the suggestion that the Tariff Commission of the United States favors it—this alleged nonpartisan Commission is like other so-called "nonpartisan commissions" composed mostly of Roosevelt Republicans and college friends of the President who left the Republican Party years ago. The intention of Congress has been repeatedly violated both in spirit and in the letter of the law by appointment of Roosevelt Republicans to represent the policies of the Republican Party.

If anyone could prove to me that this legislation would take away the job of any American in a factory, I would vote against it, but it seems to me, after listening to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] who spoke at some length that it is a fair proposition to provide a free zone or free port so that foreign goods can be transshipped.

It does not propose to favor any foreign goods or take away any American trade. It is merely to extend a much-needed convenience to the foreign shipper so that goods can be held in storage in a free zone without payment of duties until transshipped. I do not see any partisanship in the bill. I do not see that it is a Democratic measure or a Republican measure. It is brought here on its merits, just as years ago it was proposed by a Republican Congress. I see no reason to inject partisanship into it now unless Members can prove definitely that American factory owners and workers will not lose their jobs through unfair competition. I am a protectionist and believe that the American market must be preserved for the products of American labor and that our wage earners need protection more today from the cheap output of Japan and Europe than ever before.

All I can say is that the people of my district, after considering carefully the free-port proposal on its merits for several years, have asked me to support the pending bill, and I propose to do so, unless some good reason is produced why it should not be adopted.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. Is it not a fact that some factory owners and manufacturers must use foreign products at times, and this will enable them to get their supplies much better and easier?

Mr. FISH. I do not know whether that is true or not, but the free zone provides a place where they can store their goods until they are transshipped.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this bill must be for the purpose of giving a benefit to somebody. I cannot see wherein the American manufacturer or producer or where the American laborer will get any advantage under the bill. It does seem to me, however, that the American importer and the foreign producer or manufacturer is going to get some advantage, because under the terms of the bill they would be able to bring their products into the free zones, put them into the warehouses there, leave them there until such time as conditions will enable them to get an opportunity to sell their commodities.

Under present conditions I do not believe that any importer or any foreign producer or manufacturer will ship goods into this country unless they have a place to sell those commodities in this country. In other words, there are practically no goods coming into this country now unless there is someone here ready to buy them or who has already purchased the goods.

Under the terms of this bill the importer or foreign producer could ship goods into the free zone, put them in the warehouse, keep them until he has an opportunity to sell them. The only result of this kind of legislation is to encourage importation from foreign countries. This certainly is a concession to the foreign producer, the foreign manufacturer, and makes it easier for them to sell their goods and merchandise in this country.

Every time we give a concession to foreign interests who are in competition with American interests we are doing something against the interests of our own people, and I for one do not believe that we should pursue that course.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FORD. How are we going to sell goods abroad if we do not buy goods abroad?

Mr. BOILEAU. Under the present law we consume here about 93 percent of all the commodities produced in this country, and we should preserve our own market for American interests and not worry so much about the 7 percent we sell abroad.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN].

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am a little suspicious when the Greeks begin to bear gifts. I do not know how this bill is going to benefit American industry. Consumption is fixed. We consume just so much of shoes, so much food, and so much of anything else, commensurate with the amount of money we have to pay for it. Is it not a self-evident fact that the more we import from some country, the less of American goods we are going to use? I am in favor of doing a little bit for the folks over here once in a while.

Another objection I have to this bill is this: Our policy of government says we are now producing too much. We are producing too much, and still you want free ports to bring in more. Either we are wrong one way or the other. To answer the gentleman from California, the gentleman said the gentleman from Michigan should be for this bill. I am not so sure about that. I want to call to his attention that when Tia Juana, Mexico, has a free port, where they use cheap Mexican labor in the fabrication of foreign material, and rather than help American labor it harms us.

If the argument is sound that we are overproduced and that it is necessary to reduce farm acreage because of surpluses, and that the N.R.A. authorities have given industries the right to reduce the hours of labor, where is the necessity to increase our imports at this time?

Experience has shown us that if we increase imports the imported articles will be brought here in foreign bottoms. Does it not stand to reason that the greater imports we introduce into this country at this time the greater number of American articles we will displace with foreign goods.

It should also be brought to the attention of the American citizen that these foreign shipments will be financed with their money through the Federal Reserve banks at a cost of one-thirtieth of 1 percent. Of course, the Federal Reserve bankers and international bankers will make a tremendous profit from the financing of these international deals at the expense of the American Government. If the proponents of this bill will show me how it will help reopen one American factory, and not close many, I will vote for this bill. As yet, this has not been shown. I am not yet in favor of putting Russian and Japanese labor in competition with American labor.

In the course of a few years the imports of Czechoslovakian shoes rose from about 400 pairs per year to 6,000,000 pairs in 1929. This did not help the American shoe industry.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not regard this as a tariff matter in any sense whatsoever. It is a further aid to the foreigner to compete with American manufacturers. It is a further aid to the importer, because he makes his profit from the importation of foreign goods into the United States. It is a direct blow to American industry, because it furnishes facilities to permit the foreign importer to store in the United States, for immediate shipment, in competition with American-manufactured goods.

The claim is put forward that it will mean additional employment. That is probably so in those ports of free entry, but I want to call attention to the fact that whatever employment is gained there will be lost in the factories of the United States. There will be imported into these warehouses or big yards these products. The big yards will be stored with steel and cement, sugar, oil, and probably Russian and Welsh coal, and the warehouses will be filled with perishable products like shoes, cotton goods, and other commodities, manufactured in foreign countries with foreign cheap labor which come in to compete with American industry and American labor. This will simply be another facility to make foreign merchandise readily available to American buyers—and will increase the competition of the American factories.

Another thing to which I called attention a few moments ago, if there is a political party matter involved here I would place on the side of this kind of tactics the Democratic Party, because they seem to be perfectly willing that there shall come into this country foreign-made goods, free and in increasing quantities, and that the foreigner and his industry shall be financed with Federal Reserve credit. There is no question now as to that situation because of the amendments which have been made to the Federal Reserve Act, which permit the financing of the foreigner in the holding, manufacture, and shipment of his goods into the United States. We give the foreigner the benefit of cheap Federal Reserve credit through the use of acceptances. May I point out to you that acceptance credits follow these shipments from the time the raw material is manufactured abroad, while it is being shipped across, and while it is stored in the warehouse for 2 years under this plan, awaiting consumption on the part of the American public.

This is an additional advantage to the foreigner and his goods against the American manufacturer and consumer. Foreign goods are now filling the shelves of our chain and department stores, such as Macy's and Gimble's, of New York, and similar stores of other of our American cities.

To have great quantities of such goods stored in great cities of this country ready for immediate shipment to retailers in zones where quick delivery and favorable shipping zones are at hand, will, I submit, be the keenest kind of competition with American producers and besides few American manufacturers are in a position to get acceptance credits at the low rates of discount as are given to the foreigner.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am sorry, but I am through. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] 3 minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the members of the committee to the 2-year provision. Under the present law goods can be brought in and stored in bonded warehouses for a period of 3 years. The 2-year period in this bill is 1 year less than the existing law with reference to bonded warehouses which the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] helped draft in the passage of the Hawley-Smoot bill of 1930.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is furnishing free zones for the storage, a very different proposition from the present bonded warehouse which is in existence.

Mr. McCORMACK. I know, but if my friend will get this, nothing can be done under this law that cannot be substantially done under existing law except that it will result in a saving to American business, and be beneficial in many other respects. Our business men put up a bond double the value brought in from a foreign country and placed in a bonded warehouse. That means inconvenience to our business. The duty has to be paid on imports which are assembled in this country outside of bonded warehouses and when exported, they must show they are the identical goods that were imported in order to get the drawback of 99 percent. There is nothing in this bill such as my good friend from Massachusetts, Mr. CONNERY, and my good friend, Mr. WEIDEMAN, from Michigan, think. If we are going to legislate on suspicion, we will never progress. This is to expedite action for the protection of American business. They have under this bill everything that the law now gives them, except that they will be able to expedite action and save the money that they need and which can be utilized to good advantage. In addition, there are the advantages of transshipment and reexport.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. To expedite American business you want to make it easier for the importer to make a little money so that they can bring foreign goods in here cheaper, in competition with American industry, so we use more foreign goods and less American goods.

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, the gentlemen is mistaken about the imports. He should think of American business. That is what this bill is for.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. No. I know the international bankers are the only ones who profit in the interchange of foreign goods. I do not propose to penalize American industry in favor of foreign commerce to make more money for a few international bankers and traders.

Mr. McCORMACK. The international bankers have nothing to do with this bill, and I am no more interested in them than my friend is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOLMES].

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, I made an inquiry from my distinguished colleague from New York relative to the situation as it applied to steel. May I say in answer to my good friend from Massachusetts that I do not believe the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN] is unduly alarmed over this bill, nor is my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] because as a matter of fact today we are importing from European steel manufacturers steel at a rate far less than it can be produced for in this country. We have the commodities right in storage under bond in the various seaports of the United States; the manufacturers of Michigan and other States rather than consume the same material of better quality manufactured in American plants by American labor will take out of bond such quantity of this wire as they may want to use. The ultimate effect of this, of course, is to take away that much employment from American workmen. Nor do I have to go to Michigan, for I see it daily going by my door in Worcester, a city where thousands of men are employed in steel mills, as wire drawers, and so forth. These men are suffering because of this foreign competition; yet we in this country had to work for years to develop this industry.

When we come to the question of a more adequate tariff on shoes, which was accomplished after years of work by my friend CONNERY, from Lynn, do you suppose the shoe jobbers or dealers in the United States paid the increased tax? No, it was absorbed by the shipping interests and the manufacturer of the shoes abroad. The local jobber paid just exactly the price he paid before the tariff was increased. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. EDMISTON].

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the argument advanced in support of this bill that to help American shipping we must import more foreign goods into the country is ridiculous. How can we increase our imports without hurting our manufacturers?

In my opinion the chief offender under this bill would be Japan. At the present time, in pottery alone—and I speak of pottery because this industry is located in my district—Japanese imports have increased since the first of the year until now a million dozen units of Japanese pottery are imported into this country each month.

If by the passage of this bill free zones are to be created and the importation of Japanese pottery expedited, we will keep the pottery workers of West Virginia and Ohio unemployed, because Japan is flooding this country with cheap pottery made by workers who receive a wage of 4 cents a day—made by pauper labor. What do they care if they do lose money? If they lose, their Government will subsidize them.

So I fear the passage of this bill will injure American industry; and I hope the bill will be defeated.

Believing as I do that Japan will be the chief offender under this bill I want to call to the attention of the House the utter disregard of the rest of the world that Japan continues to display. Japan has the cheapest and most pauperized labor in the world. She has them in great numbers so she must find room for them. She, by sheer force, ruthlessly overrides China; and, in my opinion, if she thought she had the force would ruthlessly override the rest of the world. Why do we want to pass a measure here that will hurt our own American manufacturers, keep American labor out of work, and aid a country like Japan? I firmly believe that this bill will make it more convenient, at least, for Japanese pottery to be imported into this country; and personally I am for an embargo or limitation against all Japanese products that conflict with American articles.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have been trying fairly to understand the bill so that if possible, I could vote for it, but no illustrations of the operation of the free zones have been brought forward except the bare statement that there would be more employment in the shipping ports; but let us who represent manufacturing districts not be asleep at the switch.

The question has many times been asked if this bill would furnish facilities for the more convenient and quicker sale of foreign goods; but this question has not been answered.

I sympathize with the importer who has to pay the duty and wait a long time to get the drawback; but they finally get it after a long wait.

The question was asked if American business men could not get foreign material they needed more quickly and more readily if free-trade zones were established. Yes, of course they could; and it would also be better for those who wanted foreign merchandise in preference to domestic merchandise; and I am wondering if there are no jobbers in this country—men who do not actually manufacture—who would take advantage of this sort of thing by having these foreign goods shipped into the free ports, thus keeping large quantities on hand right on our shores.

The proponents of the bill have shown how it helps the foreign manufacturer, but they have not shown how letting foreign goods come into this country easier will help or improve the domestic manufacturer. Not a single instance of this kind has been presented. So it seems to me clear and unmistakable that it will jeopardize the domestic manufacturer and be helpful only to the ports.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the question of the free port or trade zone has been approached in this debate from various angles. I know that every Member of this House, in considering the bill and in arriving at a conclusion as to how he or she will vote upon it, will be controlled by what he or she believes to be for the best interests of our country. There never was a time when it was more essential for Members to consider the question in this light than right now. We must not lose sight of the fact that there are large numbers of people on the relief rolls today, and the reports indicate that unemployment is increasing. President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, according to a report in this morning's Post, stated that recently unemployment had been on the increase.

It so happens that I live near the northern border of the United States. I live right across from Canada on Lake Erie; and I hope you Members will listen to me for a minute, because some of you come from far inland towns and cities; therefore, you little realize what it means to live near to foreign markets. Naturally there are literally thousands of people in this country who will buy foreign goods if they have the opportunity, especially when they are operating on a limited budget. You Members may be interested to know that in 1 year 6,000,000 people crossed the Peace Bridge at Buffalo into Canada and returned to the United States the same day. Much has been said about the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, but let me say that the bill permits a person in an automobile to bring in free of duty $100 worth of foreign goods. I have the figures here, and they are very illuminating as to the amount of foreign goods that come into this country free of duty because of this loophole in the law. The Canadian law is not reciprocal. A Canadian would not be permitted under any circumstances to purchase goods in this country and take them over there.

I have some figures as to what came in through a few ports along the border. There came into this country in 1 year through 11 ports of entry merchandise valued at $4,460,107 free of duty. In addition to the above it is estimated that oral declarations of articles valued at $25 or less amounted to $450,000 more at Buffalo; $250,000 more at Pembina, N.Dak.; and $2,900,000 more at Ogdensburg, N.Y. What is happening over there is that there are stores right across the border within an hour's drive from cities in the United States. Persons drive over to Canada from Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, and even from as far away as Cincinnati. They cross over into Canada in an automobile and then return loaded down with the choicest kind of chinaware, pottery, woolens, and other articles of foreign make, which comes in direct competition with similar goods manufactured in this country. What is the result? There was a time when Buffalo had some of the finest china and pottery stores in this country. Today there are only a few of any importance left.

This system of importing foreign goods is going to reach out like creeping paralysis into the other cities. Here is what will happen under the present bill. When you establish a free port or free zone in New York, the trade center of our population, you will establish a great sales agency for the foreign governments. Make no mistake about that. People are going to flock to the free zone, not by the thousands, but by the millions. They are going to watch for foreign bargains and they are going to get them. Foreign interests will have that trade zone equipped with the finest high-pressure sales organization that money can buy. When our people go there they will be supplied with attractive, illustrated catalogs, and they will buy from them, just as many persons purchase through catalogs here. All of the foreign goods bought through this system will throw many of our workmen out of employment.

Our pottery business is now being destroyed by foreign competition. Take the tailoring establishments in Buffalo. They are at a great disadvantage when competing with the Canadian firms because of the low price of woolen cloth in Canada. I have a list here of the wonderful advertisements that are being mailed out by the thousands every day from Canada, urging Americans to "Come over to Canada to do your buying", and explaining in detail just how much can be saved by crossing over the Peace Bridge. This method of Canadian merchandising is going on all along our border and in every one of the border cities. When you open a trade zone you are inviting all the countries of the world to come in and destroy our business. Present custom duties will not stop the exploitation of the American market by foreign manufacturers. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I was astonished at the statement made by my good friend and colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK]. How in the world he can make such statements I do not know. He knows better than to say there is no change in this bill from the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act; that you can do under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act what can be done under this bill. The gentleman knows better than that if he knows anything about that act or this bill.

What is the difference? The outstanding difference is that you can import into this country any quantity of goods you want to under the free-zone system and not pay a penny's duty on them until they go into the markets in competition with American products, whereas under the drawback system of the Smoot-Hawley Act you pay your duty before the goods are landed in this country or as soon as they land. If that is not a difference I do not know what is. Under the present law thousands of dollars of interest are tied up. Under the free-zone system you pay nothing until your goods are sold. Is that not a difference?

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] knows that I am stating it correctly, and, of course, neither of us wants to accuse the other of intentional misstatements.

Reference has been made here to the fact that this bill is favored by administrative agencies and by the Tariff Commission. I deny the statement. You may read the reports from the Tariff Commission away back 20 years ago and get a little favor out of them, but, as a matter of fact, the present Secretary of Commerce said:

> There may be some doubt, therefore, whether the establishment of foreign-trade zones is as urgent at the present time.

That is a terribly left-handed recommendation for the free-zone system. On the contrary, the officials do not recommend it at all.

I call particular attention to the fact that the gentlemen would not permit the Vice Chairman of the Tariff Commission, himself a Democrat, to appear before the committee. He got some subordinate to appear before the subcommittee, but the committee could not secure a day's extension of time in order to hear from Mr. Page. He said exactly what I am saying or what Mr. Roper said, that in principle it might be all right, but there is no call for it today. There is no need for it. That is Mr. Page's opinion as well as the opinion of the Tariff Commission, and we have a letter to this effect. I will be glad to print in the RECORD a letter from the Tariff Commission making this statement. The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, May 11, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. TREADWAY: I have your letter of May 9, requesting the personal opinion either of myself or of Mr. Page regarding the merits of the legislation proposed for the establishment of foreign-trade zones in the United States.

The subject is one to which I have given little or no study and which has not come up for consideration before the Tariff Commission since I have been connected with this agency. On inquiry I cannot find that it has been a matter for Commission consideration since a report was made by the Commission based on hearings and inquiry conducted during and immediately after the World War. That report, which I am informed was written by Mr. Page, was based on conditions which were widely different from those now existing. Not only was the trade of this country at that time enormously greater than at present and severely handicapped by the lack of adequate port facilities, but also provisions of law regarding drawback, the handling of goods in bond, and other matters affecting our foreign trade were antiquated, cumbersome, and restrictive. Since that time new legislation, based upon recommendations which were made by the Tariff Commission almost contemporaneously with its report on free zones, have greatly simplified or completely removed the difficulties then imposed by law.

In view of the alteration that has occurred in the conditions enumerated there appears at present to be little that might be gained by merchants and shipowners of the United States through the establishment of free zones.

The proposed construction and regulation of such zones would entail a large expenditure. It is true that under proper regulation the greater part of such expenditures would devolve upon the ports where the zones are constructed. Nevertheless, the proper policing of the zones with a view to maintaining Federal regulations would be a matter of considerable expense to the Federal Government.

Obviously, this expense would be increased according as the number of such zones may increase. It is not unreasonable to suppose that in the competition for business the establishment of such a zone at one port would lead to a demand that a similar zone be established in many other ports. I may add that, although I have not studied the bill to which you refer with care, I am inclined to think that interior cities would likewise wish to create zones of the sort contemplated.

On the whole, whether the outlays for construction, maintenance, regulation, and policing of free-trade zones be borne by the inhabitants of the cities where they are located or by the Federal Government, it is impossible to see how profits or benefits accruing from the establishment of such zones could possibly equal the costs.

I may say that Mr. Page concurs with me in what I have written.

Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT L. O'BRIEN, Chairman.

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

So we get right down to the facts of the case, that the party in power favors foreign over domestic trade. That is what the bill is here for, and that is what you are going to be called upon to pass today. It is the same policy that we have objected to throughout this session of Congress, and we still object to the policy.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to Mr. VINSON of Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is a rather amusing thing for me in this debate to watch the operation of the human mind and the ingenuity of man in setting up bars and barriers in opposition to this legislation. Our friends on the other side say that this bill is for the benefit of foreigners. May I ask in all fairness, if the 41 foreign-trade zones in other climes are set up for our benefit, or are they created, and are they operated for the benefit of their own people? There can be but one answer to that. I realize you can throw in fear, suspicion, doubt, and all that sort of thing, but the foreign-trade zones of the world are created and operated in order to benefit the nations and the people where they are situated. That is our purpose in this bill—to benefit American business.

Our friends throw in the propaganda, and that is what it is—it is just simply bunkum—that if you create a foreign-trade zone you permit foreigners to manufacture goods, ship them over here, store them in these warehouses, and that it will be a sales house. They admit that there can be no exhibition of the goods, but, they say, somebody up in the city will have samples and will sell these goods from samples. Then they will pay the usual tariff duties and their goods will come into competition with our goods.

Now, let us see. What is to prevent any foreign concern from doing that very thing today. I submit to you that under existing law they can manufacture their goods, they can ship them into this country, they can transport them to the bonded warehouses, and then all their high-powered salesmen can have their samples and their books and sell the goods to the American people today; and when sold they pay the tariff, and the goods will go out in competition with American-made goods.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In just a moment.

All this bill does in this respect is to eliminate the requisites of law with respect to the bonds for payment of tariff. If the goods are transshipped out of the country, the drawback is eliminated. You can have all the sales from samples under existing law that you can have under this bill, and if there is anyone who cares to deny that statement, even though my time is limited, I pause for such denial.

Mr. McFADDEN rose.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to ask the gentleman to define the area, say, of the port of New York. Does it include all of New York City?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, no; the bill sets up a board to determine the area. We have the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of War. The location, area, and such things are prescribed under rules and regulations of this particular board.

Mr. McFADDEN. May it include the Rockefeller Center Building, where the exhibition of foreign goods is now taking place?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman thinks that is a serious question, I am perfectly willing for him to answer it.

I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOLMES. I agree with all the gentleman has said with reference to what the foreign governments are doing along the same line that the bill proposes, but the sooner we stop that practice, hundreds of thousands of American workmen who are today loafing will get back their jobs.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman exaggerates because of fear. The gentleman referred a moment ago to steel. I do not care to get into a controversy with him, but I happen to know something about the quantity of steel that is imported. It is of negligible quantity. We export steel. Of course, if the gentleman is fearful that a few piano wires are coming in here, of course, I cannot help it, but when you fear the importations of steel because of this legislation, it is ridiculous. Can you say that foreign business would manufacture steel, ship it to this country, and store it in a warehouse at their expense, and then await a sale, and, if not sold, then put these goods up at public action and sell them? What sort of price will they bring? They will be sold for nearly nothing. Now, my friends, when has it happened that foreign manufacturers are willing to make up and fabricate their goods with all the expense involved, bear the expense of shipment, the expense of storage, and lose all of this expenditure.

I think it is time for us to stop and take stock in regard to this legislation, because there is nothing involved here that is particularly new. It is merely a convenience to Americans and the measure is solely for their benefit.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee rise in order that the Speaker may sign a bill that is to go to the President.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose, and the Speaker, having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 9322, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 2837. An act to provide for the establishment of the Everglades National Park in the State of Florida, and for other purposes;

H.R. 6803. An act to regulate the distribution, promotion, retirement, and discharge of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes;

H.R. 9068. An act to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes; and

H.J.Res. 347. Joint resolution to prohibit the sale of arms or munitions of war in the United States under certain conditions.

FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 9322) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 9322, with Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia in the chair.

The clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when used in this act—

(a) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce;

(b) The term "Board" means the Board which is hereby established to carry out the provisions of this act. The Board shall consist of the Secretary of Commerce, who shall be chairman and executive officer of the Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War;

(c) The term "State" includes any State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico;

(d) The term "corporation" means a public corporation and a private corporation, as defined in this act;

(e) The term "public corporation" means a State, political subdivision thereof, a municipality, and a public agency of a State, political subdivision thereof, or municipality;

(f) The term "private corporation" means any corporation (other than a public corporation) which is organized for the purpose of establishing, operating, and maintaining a foreign-trade zone and which is chartered under special act enacted after the date of enactment of this act of the State or States within which it is to operate such zone;

(g) The term "applicant" means a corporation applying for the right to establish, operate, and maintain a foreign-trade zone;

(h) The term "grantee" means a corporation to which the privilege of establishing, operating, and maintaining a foreign-trade zone has been granted;

(i) The term "zone" means a "foreign-trade zone" as provided in this act.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] a few moments ago made some statements during which he said I had made the statement that there was no change in this bill from the Smoot-Hawley bill, and the gentleman knows better than that.

I am not going to draw back a bit from that statement, although the gentleman misquoted me. I sent for a copy of my remarks, and I have here what I did say, and yet I accept the statement that the gentleman from Massachusetts makes, in view of the several remarks I have made today on this bill. What I said with reference to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is as follows:

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] says that by the passage of this bill it gives the power to assemble and manipulate, and so forth. There is nothing in that that you have not in the tariff law passed in 1930, which the gentleman from Massachusetts helped to draft.

This was the statement I made, and there is nothing in this bill but what the Tariff Act of 1930 now provides with reference to the bonded warehouses of this country.

With reference to the drawback, in a colloquy with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN], I specifically referred to the drawback and I referred to that as an illustration that this bill would be helpful by eliminating the unnecessary expense and the inconvenience and the trouble of the drawback.

I like the gentleman from Massachusetts personally and have a high regard for him; and these exchanges today, while they are personal, are meant to be friendly. However, when my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] undertakes to state that I made statements that the RECORD shows I did not make, then I feel constrained for the gentleman's own personal benefit to correct the erroneous impression that honestly exists in his mind.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I not only have the highest personal admiration for my colleague [Mr. McCORMACK], but I have a very high political admiration for him. To a certain extent, that is caused by the fact that his is contrary to my own political attitude. I have known for these many years that he is rated as one of the leading influential Democrats in the Old Bay State, and we all know of his standing with his party in Congress. [Applause.] Today he is being written about, talked about, gossiped about as a possible candidate of the Democratic party for the empty honor this fall of being the Democratic gubernatorial candidate. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Did the gentleman say empty?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; I said the empty honor.

Mr. McCORMACK. But the Governor is going to be a Democrat.

Mr. TREADWAY. Not this fall as the present Governor has declined to be a candidate. My objection to the suggestion I have offered is that it would deprive this House of the services of one of the influential leaders of the Democratic side, and we all know it is greatly in need of leadership.

So far as the argument between us is concerned, I am only too glad to offer to my colleague from Massachusetts any apology or explanation or any word he wants to put in. My suggestion in relation to my statement is that my good friend talks so fast and so loud and is so rapid in gesticulation that it is hard for a confused mind like mine to follow him. Therefore, I think he will permit me to say that I surely had no expectation that he would say that there was no great difference between the Smoot-Hawley bill and this bill.

So I think he had better let the whole thing rest right where it is, and that we will continue to be as good friends as we have been for many years. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, there is a principle in law which says that there is no benefit without a burden. If this bill has any benefits I should like to have them for my district. If the benefits are charged with burdens which are not excessive, I still should like to have them. From the discussion I am not quite clear as to what it might do for people living inland.

A port of entry, while not described in the bill, is, as I understand, any port designated by the President where there is a collector of customs. That means that Chicago is a port of entry; that means that St. Louis, Peoria, and all these ports on inland waterways where there is a collector of customs are ports of entry. Now, the importance of a port of entry, inland, can best be had from this bill if you will read the first eight or ten words of section 3 on page 4, where it reads:

Foreign and domestic merchandise of every description, except such as is prohibited by law, may, without being subject to the custom laws * * * be brought into a zone.

It does not say that it must be material or mechandise that is boxed that can go into a bonded warehouse. It does not necessarily have to be crated. It says "merchandise," and that would include bulk goods.

I am here in the spirit of inquiry, and I am going to ask the committee whether that section would permit bulk goods to come in. Can ships from South America, for instance, come in with wheat, go up to one of the grain unloaders in an inland port and have that grain unloaded? It does not have to be in bags, it does not have to go into a bonded warehouse. It will save money. They do not have to crate steel to bring it in. They do not have to crate lumber. Welsh and Russian coal are included in the term "merchandise." I see nothing in the bill that compels the building of warehouses or stockyards, or anything else. Even livestock can come in under the provisions of this bill.

Now, the advantages, as pointed out, to the American importer are that there is no fee that goes along with putting bulk merchandise in bond. There would be nothing to prevent them setting up a free zone at any one of the inland ports of Illinois or Ohio or West Virginia, or wherever there is a navigable stream and a collector of customs, to permit the unloading of bulk goods, such as steel and lumber, wheat and coal. That is an advantage, as far as the importer is concerned. There is no fee for putting it in bond. There is no necessity for great extensive bonded warehouses. You can see that it is a distinct advantage. That is an important consideration.

I note that Philadelphia, Boston, San Francisco, and some of the other coast points have memorialized Congress to the effect that they are in favor of this bill. I see nothing, however, from some of the inland ports, like Duluth, Milwaukee, Chicago, St. Louis, Peoria, and elsewhere. I am just asking the committee whether they have endorsed the principle of this bill.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman realizes that if an inland port does not want to take advantage of this legislation there is nothing in the bill to compel them. It is permissive, but we felt they should have an opportunity to take advantage of it if they so desired. If we had not incorporated that thought in the bill, I think the gentleman from Illinois, my very capable friend, Mr. DIRKSEN, would be here today complaining of not being given an opportunity to avail himself of it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I want to ask another question. Is it not true that bulk goods will receive a distinct advantage under this bill as compared with the present system of having to put merchandise in bond?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I just do not follow the gentleman.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is there anything to prevent them from bringing all kinds of bulk goods that would be too expensive to put in a bonded warehouse, and upon which you must pay fees at the present time for storage in bond?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I want to ask another question. I understand that if a State or municipality undertakes to make application, it must first be approved by the legislature of the State?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Not at all. If the gentleman will take time to read the first four lines on page 2 he will find that public corporations means a State, political subdivision thereof, a municipality, a public agency of a State, political subdivision thereof, or municipality. When it comes to the definition of a private corporation it is limited to those who get a special charter from the legislature. The idea about that was to have it of a public nature, so that people might not go out and form a private corporation with the idea of making a tremendous amount of money and possibly be disappointed. Our idea was to have it of a public nature, or at least quasi-public, until this thing was tried out and we could see whether or not it was advantageous to permit it to be operated by private corporations.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The language of paragraph (d) of section 4 is rather involved. I want to say that I should like to vote for this bill if it brings any advantage to the port of entry in my district. If the disadvantages outweigh the advantages, I should vote against it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I want to say to my friend from Illinois, Mr. DIRKSEN, who is worrying about bulk goods, that all throughout the country bulk goods are being unloaded and stored in bond, under the Hawley-Smoot tariff law. In the city of Buffalo we have regular grain elevators, and we have milling concerns. The grain used in manufacturing flour for export to the island of Cuba is stored in bulk in the mills at Buffalo. It comes in as Canadian grain and goes out as American flour and gets the 20-percent preferential tariff which we have with Cuba today. It is done to the direct damage of the hard-wheat section of the Northwest and the Kansas Hard-Wheat belt. That is permitted today under the Hawley-Smoot tariff.

Now, as to goods coming into ports like New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, I have bought merchandise from samples taken while those goods were in bond, and also sold them for shipment. The original importer, after they had been bought and resold on samples procured from the bonded warehouse, paid the tariff, and shipped those goods. So that the very thing provided for in this bill is being done today.

So far as bringing in bulk grain to Peoria or St. Louis or any of the ports on the Mississippi River is concerned, I do not think that any country will be foolish enough to ship their grain into those markets, because the price is higher at the eastern terminal, to which the freight has to be paid from the West. Grain does not move in that direction.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman mentioned milling in bond, but what about other bulk commodities?

Mr. HART. I am not familiar with other bulk commodities except I have bought and sold other commodities that went directly into a bonded warehouse, obtained samples, sold goods, and then afterward the party who imported them released them from bond by paying the duty, and shipped them out. That is the only thing that can be done under the operation of this bill should it be enacted into law, but instead of having to pay this tariff, or having to get a drawback, he can store the goods indefinitely; but he can do the same thing under the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HART. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. What is the situation with reference to wheat coming into this country from Canada?

Mr. HART. They can store wheat in elevators just as they are doing in Buffalo.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. My colleague from Illinois wants to know what the bill will do for Chicago and what the attitude of the merchants and importers of that city is relative to this bill. I have received from the Commerce Association of Illinois and of Chicago several communications endorsing this legislation. Consequently I am satisfied that the business men and the importers, as well as the manufacturers, must feel favorably disposed toward the bill.

Knowing the personnel of the Ways and Means Committee, and knowing their desire to aid the commerce of the Nation, even if such a recommendation had not been made, I would not hesitate to support this legislation because under Republican administration we lost nearly all of our export trade. I want to congratulate the committee and the administration upon the splendid efforts they have made and are making toward rebuilding our exports and increasing our business and manufactures. While we still have close to 9,000,000 people out of employment, the number is being steadily reduced, and I feel that every effort should be made to increase production and create employment. I feel that this bill will, in a measure, aid in bringing that about. It is my earnest belief that this bill should receive favorable consideration and be passed without long delay.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) The Board is hereby authorized, subject to the conditions and restrictions of this act and of the rules and regulations made thereunder, upon application as hereinafter provided, to grant to corporations the privilege of establishing, operating, and maintaining foreign trade zones in or adjacent to ports of entry under the jurisdiction of the United States.

(b) Each port of entry shall be entitled to at least one zone, but when a port of entry is located within the confines of more than one State such port of entry shall be entitled to a zone in each of such States. Zones in addition to those to which a port of entry is entitled shall be authorized only if the Board finds that existing or authorized zones will not adequately serve the convenience of commerce.

(c) In granting applications preference shall be given to public corporations.

(d) In case of any State in which harbor facilities of any port of entry are owned and controlled by the State and in which State harbor facilities of any other port of entry are owned and controlled by a municipality, the Board shall not grant an application by any public corporation for the establishment of any zone in such State, unless such application has been authorized by an act of the legislature of such State (enacted after the date of enactment of this act).

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: Page 3, line 11, after the word "States", strike out the period, insert a comma, and the following: "And when two cities separated by water are embraced in one port of entry a zone may be authorized in each of said cities, or in territory adjacent thereto."

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, this is, of course, to provide for Newport News?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; to take care of such a situation as we have at Norfolk and Newport News; and I think there is a similar situation in California and one in Texas.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask a question with regard to subsection (d). Suppose a State owns harbor facilities in a port and the city owns harbor facilities in the same port. I take it, under this language, the Board could not grant an application to any corporation until the legislature of the State has taken action. In some States the legislatures meet only once in 4 years. Would this necessarily mean, therefore, that in a case such as I cited there would be a delay of from 2 to 4 years before that port city could have the advantage of this legislation?

Mr. McCORMACK. I might say to the gentleman from Alabama that that particular case was never called to the attention of the subcommittee, where the Commonwealth or the State owned port facilities in a harbor and at the same time the city owned facilities in the same harbor. It seems to me the language of this section is very protective of the city's interest and would clearly show the justification of such a provision.

The committee had in mind that in some States there are ports in which the State owns the water front or where the city owns it; and the committee was confronted with the situation where the State could immediately establish a foreign trade zone in its State-owned port, whereas the city-owned port would have to go to the legislature for authority to issue bonds to raise the necessary money to establish the foreign-trade zone. The committee felt that it was not fair to give this advantage to the State; that both should start on a par; that both should have the same opportunity.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think the committee has been eminently fair in meeting the situation; but I refer to the case of a port in which not only does the State own facilities but the municipality also owns facilities.

I think New Orleans, La., occupies this position and I know the port of Mobile, in my district, in Alabama, is in a similar position. I was fearful there might be some delay in those cities taking advantage of this legislation which I heartily approved.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If I understand the gentleman from Alabama, the case which he presents is where both State and cities own harbor facilities, of course, at the same place.

Mr. McDUFFIE. At the same place.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is my understanding that in that character of case subsection (d) would not apply.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is my opinion.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Subsection (d) is made to apply to 2 ports and 2 cities in the same State.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. In relation to the ports where one is owned by the State and the other port is owned by the city, you will notice the language:

In case of any State in which harbor facilities of any port of entry are owned and controlled by the State and in which State harbor facilities of any other port of entry are owned and controlled by a municipality.

So this would not apply to the particular case the gentleman has in mind where the State and city both owned some part of a water front within the port.

Mr. COLDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question? The harbor at San Francisco, Calif., is owned by the State. At Los Angeles the harbor is owned by the municipality. Why would it be necessary for those two cities to go to the State Legislature to establish one of these zones? I cannot see the logic of that proposition.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman takes the position that the Board, which must be a board composed of men who understand these problems would be fair in its decision and there would be no necessity for subsection (d)?

Mr. COLDEN. Yes. I cannot see any reason for discrimination against either the port of San Francisco or the port of Los Angeles.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Foreign and domestic merchandise of every description, except such as is prohibited by law, may, without being subject to the customs laws of the United States, except as otherwise provided in this act, be brought into a zone and may not be manufactured in such zone but may be stored, exhibited, broken up, repacked, assembled, distributed, sorted, graded, cleaned, mixed with foreign or domestic merchandise, or otherwise manipulated, and be exported, and foreign merchandise may be sent into customs territory of the United States therefrom, in the original package or otherwise; but when foreign merchandise is so sent from a zone into customs territory of the United States it shall be subject to the laws and regulations of the United States affecting imported merchandise: Provided, That when the privilege shall be requested the collector of customs shall supervise the unlading of foreign merchandise, in the zone, cause such merchandise or any portion thereof to be appraised and the duties liquidated thereon. Thereafter it may be stored or manipulated under the supervision and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and within 2 years after such unlading such merchandise, whether mixed with domestic merchandise or not, may be sent into customs territory upon the payment of such liquidated duties thereon; and if not so sent into customs territory within such period of 2 years such merchandise shall be disposed of under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and out of the proceeds the duties shall be paid and the remainder, if any, shall be delivered to the owners of the property: Provided further, That subject to such regulations respecting identity and the safeguarding of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, and articles previously imported on which duty has been paid, or which have been admitted free of duty, may be taken into a zone from the customs territory of the United States, and may be brought back thereto, free of duty, whether or not they have been combined with or made part, while in such zone, of other articles: Provided, That if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury their identity has not been lost such articles not entitled to free entry by reason of noncompliance with the requirements made hereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be treated when they reenter the customs territory of the United States as foreign merchandise under the provisions of the tariff laws in force at that time.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 4, line 5, after the word "manufactured" insert "or exhibited"; and in line 6, after the word "stored", strike out the word "exhibited."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of securing some information. May I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question in connection with section 3? It says that foreign merchandise may be brought into a zone in the United States and may not be manufactured or exhibited in such zone, but may be stored, broken up, repacked, assembled, distributed, and so forth. Then on page 9, line 5 of the bill, reference is made to adequate facilities for coal or other fuel. May I ask the gentleman whether or not Russian coal, for instance, will be permitted to come into these free ports and be stored?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman will find that that provision is in connection with the zone.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman tell me whether or not Russian coal may be shipped to these free zones, stored and reshipped to American consumers?

Mr. McCORMACK. This language applies to coal that is actually used in connection with the foreign trade zone itself, just the same as you and I buy coal for our homes.

Mr. McFADDEN. But, eliminating that now, can Russian coal be shipped in and stored in these free zones?

Mr. McCORMACK. No.

Mr. McFADDEN. Why not?

Mr. McCORMACK. Why, there are various reasons from the practical angle that that would not be done.

Mr. McFADDEN. Would the gentleman say that Russian coal may not be stored?

Mr. McCORMACK. Nothing can be done under this bill that cannot be done under existing law. This does not extend the existing law; it simplifies existing law.

Mr. McFADDEN. Goods may now come in under bond. It seems to me Russian coal can come in, be stored and sold in competition with coal from my State. I should like to have somebody answer that question for me. No duty would have to be paid till coal or other goods were resold.

Mr. HOLMES. Is there any limitation in this law as to where zones are created? Cannot any city establish a free zone, if they desire, under this bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. Any city that is a port of entry.

Mr. WELCH. Russian coal brought in and deposited in a foreign trade zone and that coal afterward sold in the United States would have to pay the tariff duty. Then why would they have to store the coal?

Mr. McFADDEN. For convenience in ready shipment to the trade. I am asking whether or not it is possible to ship goods in here from Russia and store and sell them here.

Mr. WELCH. That is not the intent and purpose of the bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to know whether it can be done or not.

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is as plain and clear as the noonday sun that this covers adequate facilities for coal or other fuel and for light and power.

Mr. McFADDEN. For what purpose?

Mr. McCORMACK. For the convenience of the zones.

Mr. McFADDEN. Under clause 3 merchandise or other materials may be imported from abroad.

Mr. McCORMACK. That does not relate to this at all.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman say that this will not permit the shipment of Russian coal, to be stored in these three zones, to facilitate earlier and quicker delivery?

Mr. McCORMACK. No more than the law does today. This language provides for heating and lighting.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am referring now to section 3, and no one has answered my question.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to intrude on this colloquy because I am opposed to the bill as a whole, but I do think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] brings up a question that ought to be definitely answered.

Mr. CULLEN. The question was definitely answered a moment ago.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman said it was as plain as could be, but it is not plain to the gentleman from Pennsylvania or to me or to many others here.

Mr. CULLEN. The answer is that they can no more do that under this bill than they can today.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is a mistake. What do you have the bill here for if you are not making changes in the law? If you can do under the present law what this bill provides, let us throw this bill in the waste basket and go home. It is half past 5 now and it is time to go home. There is no use sitting around here debating this bill if we can do under existing law exactly what we can do after we pass this bill.

Mr. CULLEN. If the gentleman is tired——

Mr. TREADWAY. Just a moment. I have not yielded to the gentleman. I will, of course, yield to him, but I want to insist that we have more of an explanation of the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania than simply having him told that this is as plain as can be and does not change the present law.

Mr. CULLEN. I cannot give the gentleman any further explanation of it.

Mr. McFADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, I may say further that Russian coal can be shipped into New England ports or to Atlantic ports today at $1 a ton less than it can be shipped to the same points from the anthracite section of Pennsylvania, and I should like to know whether this is going to facilitate the sale of Russian coal in competition with Pennsylvania coal.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Assuming they shipped the coal, unloaded it, and put it in storage and then shipped it out again, could they do this at a lower cost?

Mr. McFADDEN. I think they might; yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It seems very doubtful to me.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Vessels entering or leaving a zone shall be subject to the operation of all the laws of the United States, except as otherwise provided in this act, and vessels leaving a zone and arriving in customs territory of the United States shall be subject to such regulations to protect the revenue as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 6, after line 7, insert: "Nothing in this act shall be construed in any manner so as to permit vessels under foreign flags to carry goods or merchandise shipped from one foreign trade zone to another zone or port in the protected coastwise trade of the United States."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. The Board shall cooperate with the State, subdivision, and municipality in which the zone is located in the exercise of their police, sanitary, and other powers in and in connection with the free zone. It shall also cooperate with the United States Customs Service, the Post Office Department, the Public Health Service, the Bureau of Immigration, and such other Federal agencies as have jurisdiction in ports of entry described in section 2.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 7, line 25, after line 25 insert a new section as follows:

"That paragraph (1) of section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: 'The word "locality" as used herein, includes any port with respect to import, export, and coastwise traffic routed through it.'"

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment because I want to call the Committee's attention to this fact. The Supreme Court a year ago passed upon section 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act, and this amendment amends that section so that the word "locality" would include a port.

Today it is unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, to make or to give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, firm, or corporation or any particular description of traffic in any respect whatsoever or to subject any particular person, firm, or corporation or locality or any particular description of traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

I am reading from the act itself. All that this amendment does is to cure for the port cities the decision handed down by the Supreme Court, and I am sure that the Congress, when it originally passed this act, intended to have the word "locality" include a port. This is all there is to the amendment.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, this is too important an amendment to be agreed to in this way. We did not have this question presented to us when the bill was before the subcommittee or before the committee.

Mr. GOSS. That is true.

Mr. CULLEN. And I do not think we should accept it now.

Mr. GOSS. There is a bill pending now dealing with this subject and all the port cities are favorable to it.

Mr. CULLEN. I think this is a matter that should have further study, and therefore I do not think the amendment should prevail.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. If the title to or right of user of any of the property to be included in a zone is in the United States, an agreement to use such property for zone purposes may be entered into between the grantee and the department or officer of the United States having control of the same, under such conditions, approved by the Board and such department or officer, as may be agreed upon.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We did not seem to secure a great deal of information on the possibility of the importation of coal which might be sold. Like other statements, we were told that it was not going to change the law. Of course, if it is not going to change the law, we need not pass the bill.

But I state definitely that it does change the conditions under which articles can be imported, such as coal.

A year ago we were urged by the representatives of the coal area to put an excise tax on coal. It was in an excise bill but it was a tariff pure and simple. There were four articles added to the excise bill, and one was coal. The reason it was put in is that the representatives of the coal-producing area felt that there was great danger of the importation of too much Russian coal.

Mr. McFADDEN. It also includes oil.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oil, lumber, and copper, I believe, were the other articles. Now, if there is danger of the importation of Russian coal in competition with West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and other coal areas, the difference you are setting up in this bill is simply that when coal is brought in under the present law you have to pay the tariff before it can be landed. Now it is going to be stored and paid for when it is sold in competition with coal from Pennsylvania or West Virginia. If that is not a change of law, I wish the gentleman would explain it.

FOREIGN TRADE ZONES

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the passage of this bill, which provides for the setting-up of so-called "foreign-trade zones" in the ports of entry of the United States, into which foreign merchandise may be entered without payment of duty, there to be stored, repacked, assembled, and otherwise manipulated before transshipment to other countries of entry from the United States.

This bill will be of no benefit to American producers or American workmen, nor is it intended for that purpose. On the contrary, it will encourage the dumping of cheap foreign merchandise upon the domestic market, and thereby further depress domestic industry. It is out of harmony with the policy of protection and is a step in the direction of free trade. It would increase the opportunity for smuggling, and at the same time would require enormous additional expenditures for the protection of the Federal revenue.

While ostensibly proposed as an aid to the transshipment of foreign merchandise to other foreign ports, it would be used chiefly as a means of consigning immense quantities of foreign goods into the free zones, there to await sale in the United States. In fact, this is one of the arguments cited in support of the measure. In the report of the committee there is a letter from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States directly stating that—

It is believed that * * * American merchants and manufacturers will benefit in a variety of ways from the advantages of a wide American consignment market for foreign products.

The merchants who would benefit, of course, would be those selling foreign goods.

This bill is not necessary as an aid to commerce in the transshipment of foreign goods, as is contended, because under existing law there is ample provision for the importation of goods under bond and for drawback of duties on goods reexported. While doubtless complete freedom from customs custody, as provided by the bill, would be more convenient, our primary consideration must be the welfare of our own producers and the convenience of the Government of the United States.

The report of the committee sets forth letters from the Treasury and Commerce Departments supporting "in principle" the proposed legislation, but it purposely does not include a communication from the Tariff Commission, in which the Commission throws doubt upon the practicability of enacting the measure at the present time. The communication states in part:

The Tariff Commission has given no special study to this particular subject since its report to the Congress in 1919. The conditions then facing the commerce of the United States were radically different from what they are at the present time. The positive arguments then advanced by the Tariff Commission in favor of free zones accordingly would have little or no weight at present. Testimony to this effect was presented to your committee last year by Thomas Walker Page, Vice Chairman of the Commission, when you conducted hearings on the subject. The expense, the intricacy, and difficulty of devising regulatory legislation, and the probable cost imposed upon sundry ports due to efforts to maintain themselves in the competition for transshipment business would lead to considerable trouble. The amount of traffic has diminished even more. There appears to be at the present time no reason such as existed 14 years ago for the establishment of free zones.

While favoring the legislation in principle, the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Roper, also expressed some doubt as to the practicability of enacting the bill at the present time. After referring to the changes which have taken place with respect to our foreign trade in recent years, Secretary Roper said:

There may be some doubt therefore whether the establishment of foreign-trade zones is as urgent at the present time.

Although the present Secretary of the Treasury states that he sees "no objection" to the proposed measure, I call the attention of the House to the fact that under date of December 19, 1929, the then Acting Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Ogden L. Mills, in a letter to the Senate Committee on Commerce, opposed similar legislation then under consideration. He emphasized the fact that the proposed legislation was unnecessary in view of the provisions of existing law under which foreign merchandise may be manipulated under bond without payment of duty, and pointed out that after all, the warehouse system was, in effect, a modified form of free-zone activity.

In this connection, Acting Secretary Mills said:

This warehouse system has been built up by various carefully considered enactments of law extending over a long period of time. If it should seem desirable to add to the privileges now allowed under the manipulation warehouse law that of taking domestic merchandise into warehouse, this could readily be accomplished by amending said section 562.

Addressing himself to the burdens which the proposed legislation would put upon the Treasury, Mr. Mills continued:

The expense now incurred by reason of customs supervision in a restricted area such as warehouses would be small in comparison to the expense which would necessarily be incurred in guarding free zones. Exact records must be kept of all importations and of every change made in connection therewith. The same restrictions that are now thrown around warehouses, such as the employment of storekeepers, would be necessary. It seems obvious that greater opportunity for loss by smuggling and theft would be present in a large area into which domestic merchandise could be taken than is now present under the existing warehouse system.

After a careful consideration of the bill in connection with a review of the facilities now afforded by storage warehouses, where merchandise may remain for 3 years without payment of duty, of manufacturing warehouses, smelting, and refining warehouses, and manipulation warehouses, I am of the opinion that it should not become a law.

In connection with Secretary Mills' reference to the greater opportunity for smuggling, I wish to point out that the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, in his letter to the committee, also referred to this feature of the free-zone system. He said:

The location of these zones has an important bearing on the possibility of smugging. * * *

The report of the committee lays great stress upon the fact that there are now 41 foreign-trade zones in various countries of the world, one of the most noted of which is that of Hamburg, Germany. It may be that in the European countries there is some necessity for free ports, owing to the large amount of goods unladen at a central port and then transshipped to nearby countries. In this country no such condition exists. Our transshipment business is a very small part of our foreign trade, and it will always be so, no matter how many free ports we may have.

As bearing upon this phase of the bill, I wish to quote from a letter found in the hearings upon this subject which were held before the Ways and Means Committee in 1919. This quotation, I believe, is a direct answer to those who think that because the free-zone system works advantageously in Europe, it should be invoked here. Addressing the then chairman of the committee, Mr. Fordney, Mr. Irving T. Bush, president of the Bush Terminal, in New York City, stated:

There are fundamental reasons why a free port is an advantage in certain countries in Europe.

First. Some of the countries are compelled to import a large part of their raw materials for purposes of manufacture.

Second. These same countries are compelled to find a market for a large part of their manufactured product in foreign countries.

This makes an unusually advantageous combination for the development of a free port.

In the United States we produce within our own country the greater part of the raw material which enters into our manufactures, and our great market for the consumption of our manufactured products is within our own boundaries.

This variance betwen the conditions in Europe and those in the United States makes a fundamental difference between the advantages which may come from a free-port development in Europe and in this country.

My objection to free ports, however, has nothing to do with the matter of transshipments. Rather, it is directed more to their effect upon domestic industry. Attention has already been called to the smuggling feature. More important is the direct invitation to dump foreign products upon the domestic market. Not all the goods brought into the free zone will be destined for reexport to foreign countries. A large part will be sent on consignment for importation into the United States as the demand arises.

Thus these foreign-trade zones will be nothing but a bazaar, a veritable world's fair, where goods from all nations may be stored for ready access to the domestic market. The Atlantic and the Pacific, which now form somewhat of a natural barrier against foreign imports, will be obliterated by the bill. The products of Japan, of India, of Czechoslovakia, and of other countries will be sold at our very doorstep in competition with domestic merchandise.

Of course, any goods taken out of the foreign trade zone for sale in the United States must pay the regular customs duty, but the fact is that by bringing the goods to our shores in large lots and then parceling them out in small quantities, foreign producers will make it more convenient for domestic importers to obtain their merchandise. Everyone understands that accessibility for quick delivery is an important consideration in trade. The bill, therefore, is an encouragement to foreign importations and will redound directly to the detriment of American producers and American workmen. It is in complete harmony with the administration's program to make the domestic market more accessible to foreign producers. Coupled with the reciprocal tariff bill, and the consequent reduction of duties on imported foreign goods, it should help the administration's effort to make it unprofitable to produce goods in this country.

In closing, I wish to point out that this bill is the culmination of 15 years of effort to get this legislation enacted. During all that time Congress has repeatedly refused to give it favorable consideration. Now, when even some of its former sponsors admit its enactment is impracticable, it is brought out of the moth balls and rushed through with only an hour's debate. A similar bill in the Senate was put through that body without any debate.

I wish to call attention, also, to the fact that the Tariff Commission, in their letter to the committee, stated that they would be glad to have Commissioner Page come before the Ways and Means Committee and discuss the bill, and that the committee refused to call him before it. This legislation was handled in the committee by a subcommittee, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULLEN] was chairman. It was reported out by the full committee after only brief consideration at a morning session, without a majority of the committee knowing what it was all about. I tried, unsuccessfully, to postpone consideration for an additional day to have Commissioner Page come before the full committee and explain the Commission's opposition to the bill. Of course, if the Democratic majority wish to take the responsibility for enacting this legislation without full consideration of its implications, that is their privilege. Most of the legislation which has been enacted in the Seventy-third Congress has been considered in this way.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there is no more authority in this bill for the importation of Russian coal into this country than exists in existing law. Under existing law, Russian coal can be laid down in New York Harbor and can be stored in a bonded warehouse. Whenever that coal is taken from the bonded warehouse, you must pay the tariff upon the coal and then it goes into competition with American-produced coal.

Under this bill coal can be laid down in New York or any other foreign-trade zone; and before it goes into competition with other coal, it must pay a tariff duty. The only difference between existing law and this bill is that under this bill you avoid the execution of bond.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the same is true on oil.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And the same is true on oil. This bill does not open the door any wider for Russian coal or foreign oil than the present existing law of the land.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. GLOVER. Section 4 of this bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall assign to the zone necessary customs officers and guards to protect the revenue and to provide for the admission of foreign merchandise into the customs territory. The question I desire to ask is, Will that require an additional expense to be incurred in the collection of this revenue? Will it not create quite an additional expense in collecting the revenue when it is collected?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman asks a very pertinent question. I refer him to section 14, on page 10, where he will find that the cost of maintaining the additional Customs Service required under this act shall be paid by the operator of the zone.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. (a) No person shall be allowed to reside within the zone except Federal, State, or municipal officers or agents whose resident presence is deemed necessary by the Board.

(b) The Board shall prescribe rules and regulations regarding employees and other persons entering and leaving the zone. All rules and regulations concerning the protection of the revenue shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

(c) The Board may at any time order the exclusion from the zone of any goods or process of treatment that in its judgment is detrimental to the public interest, health, or safety.

(d) No retail trade shall be conducted within the zone except under permits issued by the grantee and approved by the Board. Such permittees shall sell no goods except such as are brought into the zone from customs territory.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 11, line 10, after the word "such", insert "domestic or duty-paid or duty-free goods."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have always favored a protective tariff, and I do today. I believe in protection for American industry and American labor. For that reason I am going to support this bill because I believe it effects no change as far as the protective tariff is concerned, for any commodity that might come to our shores.

I notice that this bill has received favorable commendation from such public and private organizations as the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, the Merchants' Association of the City of New York, the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Philadelphia Board of Trade, the Baltimore Association of Commerce, the Chicago Association of Commerce, the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, and many other trade and public organizations.

The San Diego Chamber of Commerce has wired me urging me to support this measure. The membership of these various organizations which favor this legislation are composed of Democrats and Republicans alike, and they are all, each and every one, Americans and must therefore necessarily have the welfare of this country and this Nation and the industries of this country and the labor of this country at heart.

The Secretary of the Treasury says:

I believe that, under normal conditions in world trade, foreign trade zones such as provided for in the bill might aid materially in fostering a growth of the transshipment and reexport trade of ports advantageously situated to handle such trade. In principle, therefore, I believe the bill is meritorious, and I see no objection to its enactment.

The Secretary of Commerce, Daniel C. Roper, says:

The establishment of such foreign-trade zones is for the purpose of facilitating reexport and transshipment trade. It can hardly be expected that the potential volume of such trade will approach the extensive operations of Hamburg and certain other so-called "free ports" of Europe. However, if such ports are properly located with regard to existing and potential currents of trade, they should not only aid in the expansion of our export and transshipment trade, but be of some assistance to our merchant marine. The proposal does not introduce anything essentially new into our law. In fact, this is little more than the minimizing of the official limitations and costs involved in the formalities of entry into bonded warehouse and drawback now provided in the American tariff law.

I sincerely trust that this bill will receive your favorable consideration. I for one am heartily in favor of it and will support it.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that this bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]. I understand that through a misunderstanding Mr. CELLER is not here today. I know he was heartily in favor of the bill. I know that he appeared before the subcommittee many times in its favor. I know that if he were here, he would be in the well fighting for its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H.R. 9322) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, and that, pursuant to House Resolution 381, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is ordered under the rule.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. BYRNS. I hope the gentleman will withhold the point of order, for we have an agreement that we shall not have a roll call on the bill until tomorrow.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if that is the understanding, I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I understand a number of Members desire to submit unanimous-consent requests. In accordance with an understanding, it is my purpose to move to adjourn as soon as these requests are submitted so that the roll call on the bill will come tomorrow.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes tomorrow immediately following the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes tomorrow immediately following the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

MY WORK IN CONGRESS

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the criticism and sneers hurled at the administration by some, the fact remains that we are gradually coming out of the depression under the leadership of President Roosevelt. There is room for a great deal of dissatisfaction due to mistakes which are inevitable in the conduct of human affairs. But, sir, when we take the condition of the country in the early part of 1933 as compared with the situation in this year, 1934, every loyal and patriotic citizen must feel some real satisfaction in the results.

Since the convening of this Congress this House, with the cooperation of a very large number of the Republican faith, has passed all emergency legislation requested by the President and more permanent legislation for the benefit of the masses of the people than any legislative body within the memory of anyone here.

It thrills me with pride to look over the record of accomplishments, a few of which I desire to call to the attention of the country.

When we convened this Congress every bank in this country was closed—when had such a condition faced a President and a Congress in this country? Never within our existence as a Nation.

Agriculture was the first industry to receive attention. We immediately passed the agricultural relief measure, under which millions of dollars have been paid to struggling farmers throughout the whole country. Following up this act we passed the farm-mortgage relief bill. We then gave our attention to that great menace and evil, war; we passed an act to prohibit the exportation of arms and munitions of war.

We proceeded to pass an act creating a Federal relief administrator.

Then came the passage of Muscle Shoals and the Tennessee Valley Authority Acts.

The loss of homes of our people was considered and we passed the bill for the relief of the home-mortgage indebtedness.

We then concurred in Senate amendments to these relief measures providing for currency issuance and regulation.

We found the life-insurance policies of our citizens imperiled and their savings of a lifetime for the benefit of their widows and children threatened and we passed a measure permitting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to save the situation.

We then passed the National Recovery Act. This, in my humble judgment, is the greatest instrument ever devised by the mind of man to bring about a revolution against greed and avarice in any country. It cannot be expected to work perfectly because it is an entirely new machine thrust into the social and industrial life of a great and intelligent people. It has to be used, tried, and the rough parts of the machinery smoothed up to run true. The machine must be used for the helpful purposes for which it was designed, and not as an instrument of destruction. It is designed as a destroyer of greed and a distributor of profits fairly to those who produce these profits.

Much, of late, has been said in the papers and magazines about the "brain trust." Well, Mr. Speaker, it takes brains to properly handle the situation at the present time and, for my part, I prefer that the destiny of my country be guided by a "brain trust" rather than by "trusts" without either brains or conscience.

The pitiful state of our citizens out of employment was a real challenge to the administration and to this House, but, Mr. Speaker, we met that challenge in part by the enactment of the great public works bill, and we are meeting that challenge at this session by additions to this act. Every citizen who needs employment should be given a job until industry can absorb the unemployed. As between employment or a dole, our citizens prefer employment. But life must be sustained until employment is obtained.

Mr. Speaker, now is the time to inaugurate a pension for the helpless, aged, and injured people of this country. They have lived thus far a miserable existence upon the charity of their neighbors and kindred who are not able longer to carry the burden. More work and less dole for the able-bodied is a sound policy.

Mr. Speaker, although the House in the early days of this session passed the Economy Act, affecting the compensation and pension of our citizens who had marched in the columns of the defenders of our country, a measure to which I could not and did not give my consent and against which I voted, yet this House, upon disclosure of the injustices worked upon our soldiers, modified the act in some respects, with the approval of the President, before the first session adjourned.

To safeguard the interests of the people who deposit their money in banks we have created a Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, guaranteeing deposits to the amount of $2,500 for any one depositor. Bank failures have ceased within the year.

This present session of Congress has unceasingly labored to provide measures for the continued return of prosperity. Lack of time precludes me from giving in detail the many accomplishments.

Mr. Speaker, many of us differed in judgment upon the question of the appropriation for the relief of the soldiers, and this difference in opinion resulted in the overriding of the veto of the President. Much ado was made and criticism of our action in that regard was had. I, for one, am not in accord with the claim that it is for the best interests of the country to put the burden of caring for disabled and sick ex-service men upon the local communities at this critical time when every community is taxed to the limit and more to care for their own distress. I, for one, have followed our great leader, the President, in the making and sustaining of his efforts for real recovery, and yielded to his judgment, but upon legislation for the ex-service men I have some notions of my own. I, for one, am of the opinion that more money in circulation would be a good thing for all our people in every walk of life. I, therefore, supported the act to grant power to the President to value the gold content of the dollar and the Dies silver bill.

It was this conviction that caused me to work and vote for the payment of the soldiers' bonus, together with the conviction that it should have been paid long ago—and I am still for the bonus payment for the benefit of ex-service men and put thousands of dollars of new money in circulation in the Fourth Congressional District, where it is needed.

Mr. Speaker, I have already taken more time than I anticipated. There are some who criticize Congress because of mistakes made by those who are appointed agents of the Government to carry out the intention of Congress. This misconstruction placed upon the purpose of Congress by certain officials whose duty it is to administer is no new thing. It is sometimes done purposely by those in authority not in sympathy with the legislation, but often it occurs from sheer lack of study. In my judgment, only those in sympathy with a legislative measure should be chosen to administer the same.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, all the agents of the Government ought to be made to realize that they are the employees of the great mass of American taxpayers, and where they are rude in their contact with the public they should be fired.

There is some unrest resulting from injustices occurring here and there, but a deal of the criticism leveled at Congress comes from some ambitious souls who, while promising great redress of wrongs and proclaiming great patriotism on their part, have an eye out for their own selection to the place held by some hard-working Congressman.

It is unnecessary and out of place for me to speak of my part in what takes place in this House. Every Member is fairly well acquainted with that.

Some persons never praise any meritorious act of the Congressman but are content to stir up the feelings of the people against the person in, to make room, not for someone more capable but to make room for themselves.

They present no record of accomplishments in their private career that attracts the attention of their fellow citizens out of their community, but put in a great part of their time asking the old threadbare question, "What has he done in Washington?"

Mr. Speaker, the American people will not be misled by such fallacies. The people everywhere realize the gigantic task before those elected to Congress to return this country to prosperity. It is a laudable ambition for any man to aspire to a seat in this House, but in this crisis the public welfare should be uppermost in the minds of our people.

The selection of a Representative in this House is the duty of all the people of a district and not the duty of a few politicians. As to my services here, I am content to let my record speak for itself. Modesty and lack of time prevent me from giving an extended list.

At the outbreak of the war I introduced the bill regulating the sale of explosives in this country and it was promptly enacted.

It was my bill to grant soldiers 1 cent railroad fare while on furlough that resulted in that going into effect.

I also introduced a bill to grant a $60 bonus upon discharge to soldiers, sailors, and marines.

I introduced bills to grant seed and feed loans to farmers in drought-stricken areas.

I introduced the first allotment bill for agricultural relief.

I introduced and passed the Debtors Relief Act.

I secured a Federal fish hatchery in the fourth district.

I introduced one of the first bonus bills.

I secured an appropriation of $364,000 to pay the absentee Shawnees a debt owed them by the United States for 60 years.

I secured an Indian hospital near Shawnee.

I secured public buildings at Ada and Sapulpa and authorization to build Federal buildings at Bristow, Drumright, Okemah, Wewoka, Holdenville, and an addition to the post-office building at Shawnee.

These are a few instances in which I have done something for the fourth district.

I have performed the duties required of a faithful Representative and kept the faith of the people whom I represent.

When they ask what have I done, I can point with satisfaction to this record for which no friend of mine need apologize.

MILITARY DEFENSE OF ALASKA

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given to extend my remarks, I desire again to call the attention of the House to what I consider the vital necessity of undertaking without delay some military defensive works for Alaska, including, of course and principally, air defense.

The newspapers of May 24 carry news articles concerning a statement said to have been made by the Secretary of the Navy, in which Secretary Swanson is quoted as having said that in the event Japan builds warships in excess of its London Treaty allowance, the need of additional American bases in the Pacific coast region would be considered.

In this connection it is well to remember that the Washington and London treaties do not limit, and do not attempt to limit, the United States with respect to installing defensive works and stationing defensive forces in the main body of continental United States or Alaska. It is true that in the Washington Treaty the United States agrees, substantially, not to fortify, among other places, the Aleutian Islands, which extend out from the main body of Alaska a distance of some 600 miles toward the Japanese Archipelago.

It would serve no useful purpose at this time to discuss the wisdom of this provision of the Washington Treaty in thus limiting the rights of the United States with respect to its own territory. But I cannot forbear observing that if any such limitation had been suggested to Japan with respect to the Japanese Archipelago we would have been met with the assertion that any such limitation upon the Japanese would have run counter to their national security and honor. But the Washington Treaty was ratified and so we may as well pass by at this time that provision of the treaty.

Not for Alaska only, but for the proper defense of the Nation, I again urge that proper defensive measures be taken for the Territory of Alaska, and those measures can only be taken by stationing in Alaska a substantial air and military force. We all agree that in doing this there is no element of aggression or of an aggressive spirit. If there is one nation in the world at the present time that does not wish expansion of its territory at the expense of its neighbors—or at all—that Nation is the United States.

We do not seek any further power or any territorial aggrandizement under the deceptive phrase that we desire a place in the sun. We merely wish to live our own lives in our own way and to be safe from aggression of those nations which are seeking to expand their boundaries no matter what may be the cost to the welfare and the peace of the world. Our intentions are best shown by the passage of the Tydings-McDuffie bill designed to grant ultimate freedom to the people of the Philippines without any reservations that can be in the slightest degree for our benefit either militarily or economically. In this connection it may be well to consider whether the objections of any foreign nation to proper defensive measures for our own territory are not based upon a spirit of conquest.

I assume that the policy of the Government and of the people of the United States is not one of "scuttle." I suppose that a weak nation might conceivably yield some of its possessions, like the Territory of Alaska, extremely valuable in many natural resources, to a foreign nation that was bound on conquest and on expansion, but if this policy is once adopted, why then, I suppose, at the price of peace, the same pusillanimous view would lead to the yielding of Hawaii and ultimately of the Pacific coast of the United States.

The alternative policy and the one which is supported by the sentiments of patriotism and manhood, as well as of justice and honor, ought to impel the people of the United States to take proper and adequate defensive measures for all of our possessions which do not wish to be erected as independent nations.

As I have pointed out before to the House, the possession of Alaska by any foreign country would be a constant and ever-present threat to the integrity of the continental United States. Leaving out of consideration what is commonly known as southeastern Alaska, a narrow strip of land embracing many islands extending along the west boundary of Canada, we find that the main body of Alaska is only 1,400 miles in a direct line from the northern part of the Pacific coast of the United States, whereas Hawaii is approximately 2,200 miles distant from the Pacific coast of the United States. The members of this House may not know that Prince William Sound, Alaska, which, as I have said, is only about 1,400 miles from the northern part of the Pacific coast of the United States, contains many harbors such as Valdez, Cordova, Seward, Fidalgo Bay, and others that would form admirable bases for the largest fleets of the world and sufficient in size and contour to accommodate such fleets safely.

While it may be impractical to fortify all of the 35,000 miles of the coast line of Alaska, it is at least practical to station in Alaska the comparatively small defensive force, principally an air force, that would render the seizure and occupation of any part of Alaska by any hostile nation very difficult indeed. No foreign nation would have the right to object to the installation of any such defensive measures, and, the fact, if it be a fact, that any foreign nation does object to it is the best proof which can be offered of the aggressive intentions and the spirit of conquest which animates such a foreign nation.

It is well to remember in connection with the matter discussed that so far as national defense is concerned, we have been in many cases eternally too late and we have sacrificed many lives and billions of dollars because we did not make in time adequate provisions for our defense. The thing that I urge upon the Congress now is that these defensive measures be undertaken so as to save lives and treasure in the future.

Sensible people will realize that it is folly to depend upon the charity and good nature and the self-control and the unselfishness of all of the people of the world who are in a position to attack us. We have not yet arrived at that beatific state where everybody is good and virtuous. We must know, if we look about us, that there are nations, just as there are individuals, who are outlaws and who shoot first and talk about it afterward; nations that do not take the trouble to declare war until they have inflicted the greatest possible injury on the enemy. If we are the victims of any such acts we have only ourselves to blame. Alaska has been too long overlooked in the scheme of national defense. It is time to act now.

May I direct your attention here to the provisions of H.R. 9524 and the measure of defensive protection that the passage of this bill would afford to the citizens of the United States generally and also to those citizens of our Nation who reside in the Territory of Alaska.

However, my principal object in introducing H.R. 9524 was not so much to have a defensive force in the Territory of Alaska as to give to the Army pilots needed training in flying in that region and thus enable them to become acquainted with the terrain and also to give them practice that is bound to be very valuable in flying ships of all types in subarctic temperatures to be encountered in all northern latitudes in the wintertime.

It is obvious, of course, that wars in modern times are not fought only in the summer and in fine weather. The Army pilots, whom I believe to be equal to any in the world, are unhappily deficient in actual flying practice in cold and stormy weather. This is something that cannot be learned from books, and the men must have actual experience in order to take care of themselves and their equipment and to reach their objectives. The commercial pilots in Alaska have had this experience, but they could not have acquired their present information in any other way. With an Army training and defense base in Alaska, an opportunity will be given to a very large proportion, if not all, of the military pilots to obtain this valuable experience in Alaska. Moreover, it is obvious, in the event Alaska is a theater of war, that the actual experience with the topography of the country to be gained by pilots who fly in Alaska is bound to be of the highest military value.

It is not impossible that if an air unit is stationed in Alaska the pilots will be able to devise protective safeguards whereby they will be enabled to fly in all sorts of weather without hazard. Surely it is plain that the military pilots should have the experience of flying all types of ships under all sorts of conditions. A part of this experience can be gained by them in United States territory only in Alaska.

FREE WHITE HAIR AND WRINKLED BROWS FROM DREAD AND ANXIETY BY OLD-AGE SECURITY LEGISLATION

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, the question of old-age security is receiving much consideration in the Congress. Also passage of the Wagner-Lewis unemployment insurance bill has been vigorously urged by its advocates.

I served as a member of the Ohio commission on unemployment insurance, signing the report recommending unemployment insurance for my State. In fact, I helped draft the unemployment insurance measure introduced in the General Assembly of Ohio. I greatly regret that important social legislation of this character may be shelved to clear the way for an early adjournment of the Congress. The Democratic national platform of 1932 stated "we advocate unemployment and old-age insurance under State authority."

My purpose today, Mr. Speaker, is to address the House upon old-age security. On a future occasion, when the Wagner-Lewis bill is before us for debate and vote, I shall express my views in support of that measure.

The House Committee on Labor is considering a national system of old-age pensions. Present poor-relief systems for the indigent aged are inadequate. In addition, they are costly and give no assurance of security. China and India are about the only nations which do not have old-age-security laws. No problem before us is of greater importance than that of freeing white hair and wrinkled brows from care and anxiety.

About 350 years ago while Elizabeth was Queen, somebody thought of the poorhouse. Since then we have found better ways of doing everything. We have exchanged the quill pen for the fountain pen and printing press; the candle for the electric light; the horse for the railroad, automobile, and airplane. Stage coaches, tallow dips, flintlock muskets are gone never to return. Nevertheless, we still tolerate the poorhouse. We care for our needy aged by methods in vogue in 1588.

After 4 years of depression this problem is particularly acute. Savings of thousands of aged people have been wiped out despite the fact that they providently and thriftily saved for their future. They are destitute. Their sons and daughters, lacking jobs in many instances, cannot help. Younger people and the middle aged may never be able to accumulate sufficient for their own old age, certainly they are not able to provide adequately for their aged and infirm parents. This depression, like war, leaves its toll for future generations to pay. The question is shall we provide for our aged extravagantly and cruelly, in poorhouses; or humanely, economically, and scientifically, by old-age pensions?

I am proud to represent the people of Ohio and hope my constituents will retain me for a second term as their Congressman by a vote of confidence this November. Last November the citizens of my State by an overwhelming vote, in fact by a majority of nearly 3 to 1, adopted old-age pensions for Ohio. This was the largest majority ever accorded an issue voted on in Ohio.

We provide that the needy individual, aged 65, or older, who has been for some years a resident of Ohio, shall receive $25 per month as long as he, or she, lives. No individual with an income equal or greater than this can receive an old-age pension, nor is such pension payable if the individual draws compensation or pay for work in competition with others, nor if the individual has deprived himself or herself of property in order to qualify for benefits under this law.

Old-age pensions provide an open road for happiness and contentment for men and women who have, through no fault of their own, beheld the savings of a lifetime swept away as a result of ill-founded trust and abiding faith in big city bankers, in manipulated insurance companies, in exploiting building-and-loan associations, or have been swindled in any manner through the connivance of others, or who have by reason of economic conditions, been unable to lay aside sufficient for the rainy day that awaits us all. Local communities now overburdened, relatives now overtaxed, caring for the less fortunate, and county poorhouses, will be displaced. A new era is at hand. The aged and infirm will face security and contentment instead of uncertainty, humiliation, and misery.

We should establish in the Nation old-age security for every needy person of 65 years or older. Legislatures in 27 States, including New York and California, have enacted this beneficient legislation. In Ohio and other States, old-age security acts have been adopted by direct mandate of the people. Ours is the only civilized country in the world that does not have a national old-age pension law. The cost of four battleships will pension every needy old person in all our 48 States.

The average State pension approximates $22.50 per month. The average cost of maintaining inmates in poorhouses is $40 a month. Justice and ordinary business prudence call for old-age security legislation.

The need for old-age security legislation is brought about by the congestion and intensity of modern industrial processes. Either aged people, in honorable poverty, must be supported by private charity or by the State. I favor old-age security legislation because it is the duty of the Government and also because the reliance upon private charity is an unequal and insecure dependence for men and women who have earned the right to live their few remaining years in modest independence, and enjoy a little repose.

The hope we all cherish is an old age free from care and want. To that end people toil patiently and live closely, seeking to save something for the day when they can earn no more. And yet the same fate awaits the majority. In the life of the worker there are weeks, often months, of enforced idleness, weeks of unavoidable sickness, losses from swindling, and then, as age creeps on, there is a constantly declining capacity to earn, until at 65, many find themselves destitute. There is no more pitiful tragedy than the lot of the worker who has struggled all his life to gain a competence and who, at 65, faces the poorhouse. The black slave knew no such tragedy as this. It is a tragedy reserved for the free worker in the greatest nation on earth.

There is nothing radical about the old-age-pension idea, though, personally, I do not fear being termed a "radical." The word "radical" is derived from the Latin word meaning root. We ought to go to the roots of our social and economic troubles. As a matter of fact, payment of old-age pensions by the State or National Government involves no new policy nor any innovation of principle. In 1913, as a member of the General Assembly of Ohio, I participated in the enactment of Ohio's first mothers' pension law. Before that time the State had dealt in haphazard fashion with children of destitute widows. Children were sent to children's homes and the mother to work. This blighted the lives of children and brought misery to the mother. Instead of cruel separations of mothers and children, we now have the enlightened system of mothers' pensions, which provides for regular payments to mothers to take care of their children. The family is kept together. Furthermore, the cost to the State is less. No State that has adopted mothers' pensions has returned to the old inhuman methods. I urge the same principle for the needy aged who, after a lifetime of industry, effort, and struggle, at 65 become in need of assistance from the Government or from public or private charities. It is time to free white hair and wrinkled brows from dread and anxiety. Instead of sending them "over the hill to the poorhouse", the Government should lend a helping hand in a scientific and adequate manner to our deserving and needy aged as they go down the sunset side of life.

Mr. Speaker, private charities, bread lines, and soup kitchens must not be the only answers of American intelligence and sense of justice to the problem of unemployment and indigent old age. Out of the hardships of this depression, when millions of people sought work which they could not find, let us hope that a better future may come for aged men and women whose condition is desperate even in the best of times, and through no fault of their own.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 36

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Senate Resolution 36 and to include a copy of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw attention to Senate Joint Resolution 36, honoring Gen. Casimir Pulaski, which has recently been signed by the President. A copy of the resolution follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 36

Authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11, 1934, General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski

Whereas the 11th day of October 1779, is the date in American history of the heroic death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, who died from wounds received on October 9, 1779, at the siege of Savannah, Ga.; and

Whereas the States of West Virginia, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Kentucky, Illinois, Michigan, Tennessee, Indiana, Wisconsin, New York, Nebraska, Texas, Minnesota, Delaware, Maryland, Arkansas, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Missouri, Ohio, and other States of the Union, through legislative enactment designated October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has by legislative enactment designated October 11, 1929, and October 11, 1931, to be General Pulaski's Memorial Day; and

Whereas it is fitting that the recurring anniversary of this day be commemorated with suitable patriotic and public exercises in observing and commemorating the death of this great American hero of the Revolutionary War: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized to issue a proclamation calling upon officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on all governmental buildings on October 11, 1934, and inviting the people of the United States to observe the day in schools and churches, or other suitable places, with appropriate ceremonies of the death of Gen. Casimir Pulaski.

The Congress of the United States, in recognition of the valiant services of the great Polish Revolutionary War hero, Gen. Casimir Pulaski, has passed this joint resolution in commemoration of his death. It is a fitting and proper tribute to one of America's early patriots.

The resolution, passed unanimously, authorizes the President to declare October 11, 1934, as a select day in memory of General Pulaski. The President will issue a formal proclamation, which will be broadcast by radio and newspaper to every remote corner of our Nation, announcing the occasion. On October 11, next, our Federal establishments, public buildings, schools, and homes throughout the Republic will proudly display the country's flag in reverent respect to a man who fought so ably and courageously that the dreams of a new Government might be realized.

Throughout the United States on October 11, patriotic demonstrations and appropriate ceremonies will be enacted. The name of General Pulaski, now hailed by historians as an outstanding martyr in the cause of American independence, will reverberate from coast to coast and the inspiring story of his military heroism and strategy will be told in the schoolrcoms of America, This day, in remembrance of the youthful General Pulaski's tragic death in the service of our Nation, marks a holiday on which every loyal American citizen should pause a moment to pay tribute to his memory.

Casimir Pulaski was born in Podolia, Poland, on March 4, 1748. Early in life he became interested in military affairs and served as a soldier before he was 20. Like his father, who won fame fighting for the redemption of Poland, young Pulaski's reputation as a brave and intrepid fighter spread throughout Europe.

Through an unusual coincidence, in 1776, he met Benjamin Franklin in Paris, and although Franklin was an old man, their mutual ideals and philosophies drew them together.

Pulaski was fired with the story of the stubborn struggle of the American Colonies for independence, and in March 1777 he came to this country and immediately joined General Washington's staff. From that day on the colorful, dashing young Pole became a commanding figure in the war for liberty and self-government. A romantic, adventurous, and fearless cavalryman, time after time he led his troops to victory.

His enthusiasm and loyalty to the American cause was an inspiration to his men, and through his meritorious efforts and brilliant strategy he won the undying friendship of George Washington. As a result of his services in the Battle of Brandywine, Congress commissioned him a brigadier general, upon General Washington's recommendation.

Every history textbook contains an account of the stirring deeds of Pulaski's legion, which was a corps of light infantry under General Pulaski's command.

On October 9, 1779, Pulaski stormed the city of Savannah, Ga., where he had driven the British after several days' hot pursuit. Riding bravely at the head of his famous cavalry, he was mortally wounded but stayed in the thick of the battle until the conflict was over. He was removed from the battlefield and placed on board the brig Wasp for transfer to Charleston. However, the ship was delayed by adverse winds, and the noble Pulaski died at sea, where he was buried with simple ceremonies. His distinguished career was ended at 31.

The patriotic character and loyal devotion of this youthful Polish military genius deserves to become forever enshrined in American hearts, and the action of Congress and President Roosevelt in setting aside October 11 in his honor is commendable. America will pay him due homage.

REVISION OF AIR-MAIL LAWS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 3170) to revise air-mail laws.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will let this conference report go over until tomorrow, for it is now a quarter of 6.

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman from New York that I have discussed the conference report with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. I do not think it will take over 5 minutes to dispose of the conference report.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be heard a few minutes to discuss the conference report.

Mr. SNELL. I would remind the gentleman that it is getting late. A point of no quorum was withdrawn with the understanding that no further business would be transacted this evening other than the submission of unanimous-consent requests.

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman from New York that I will not take any time on the conference report myself. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] will probably want to make an explanation of the report.

Mr. SNELL. I think we ought to have an explanation of the conference report.

Mr. MEAD. The conferees are practically in agreement.

Mr. SNELL. I would say they are very far from agreement, for none of the minority conferees have signed the report; is not this true?

Mr. MEAD. That is true on the part of the House committee, but I should like to have the matter disposed of tonight so we can get the bill back to the Senate. It will not take over 5 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. I do not want to object, but I think it is too late to bring up a conference report. I wish the gentleman would let it go over until tomorrow, although I understand, of course, that this is a privileged matter.

Mr. MEAD. I shall be very glad to yield under the circumstances; there is nothing else to do.

CHILD-LABOR AMENDMENT

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Richard J. Beamish, secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, forwarding certificate of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WEAVER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. SISSON, for today and tomorrow, on account of important business.

To Mr. MUSSELWHITE, for May 29, 30, and 31, on account of business at home.

To Mr. KVALE, for today, on account of illness.

To Mr. KENNEY, for 3 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ADAMS, for today, on account of important business.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] is still detained from the Senate on account of illness, and that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily absent.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] are necessarily absent from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

INVITATION TO COAST ARTILLERY SCHOOL BATTLE PRACTICE

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I should like to have read at the desk a brief letter from Maj. Gen. W. F. Hase, Chief of Coast Artillery.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF COAST ARTILLERY,
Washington, May 18, 1934.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Chairman Military Affairs Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: Believing that some members of your committee and perhaps other Members of the Senate might be interested in seeing a Coast Artillery target practice, I would like to invite them to go to Fort Story, at the entrance of Chesapeake Bay, on June 8 to see the student officers at the Coast Artillery School conduct their battle practice with 8-inch railroad guns and 155 G.P.F. guns. This firing is scheduled for the morning of Friday, June 8. The party would have to leave on the 6:30 p.m. Washington-Norfolk boat Thursday, June 7, arriving at Norfolk at 8 a.m., Friday, June 8. The round-trip fare is $5, and passengers can take their automobiles as baggage without any extra charge. The trip from Norfolk to Fort Story can be made in 1 hour. The party can return from Norfolk that night and be back in Washington at 7 a.m. Saturday, June 9.

I believe such a trip would be interesting to your members, as they would have the opportunity to see our installations at Fort Story and to know what we try to teach our students at the Coast Artillery School.

If any of the Members might desire to remain over Sunday in "tidewater Virginia", they could spend Saturday and Sunday at Fort Monroe, Va., at Yorktown, Jamestown, and Williamsburg, returning from Fort Monroe on Sunday night's boat or driving back to Washington at their convenience.

I would be glad to know if any Members contemplate going, in order to inform the Commandant of the Coast Artillery School, who will arrange to meet the party at Norfolk and conduct them to Fort Story.

Sincerely yours,

W. F. HASE,
Major General, Chief of Coast Artillery.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I trust that as many Senators as possible will visit Fort Story on the occasion of the target practice, and, if any can make the trip, I hope they will let me know in advance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a memorial from William S. Hauser, legislative director, etc., Brooklyn, N.Y., stating, in part, that "The postal workers of America, composed of postal employees of all classifications, urge rejection of S. 3523 in its present form, and adoption instead of bill providing for abolition of postal furloughs and guaranteeing continued employment of every postal employee", which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Sovereign Grand Lodge of F. and A. M. of Puerto Rico, in its annual communication held in Mayaguez, P.R., favoring the passage of the so-called "Lanzetta bill", excluding the island of Puerto Rico from coastwise shipping laws, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

LA FAYETTE MEMORIAL PARK, TALLAHASSEE, FLA.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a statement embodying a resolution adopted by the City Commission of Tallahassee, Fla., relative to the dedication of La Fayette Memorial Park in that city, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEDICATION OF LA FAYETTE MEMORIAL PARK

Marquis de La Fayette, a French general and statesman, and one of George Washington's most faithful officers during the American Revolution, was born September 6, 1757, in France. His parents died when he was a youth, leaving him large estates. He entered the French army and became a general in active service. At the beginning of the American Revolution, General La Fayette espoused the cause of American independence, and, fitting out a ship, sailed from Spain, landing at Georgetown, S.C., April 24, 1777, among his companions being Baron de Kalb. The arrival of La Fayette in America gave new hope to the supporters of the revolutionary cause. On July 31, 1777, Congress bestowed upon him the rank of major general, and he was soon after attached to the staff of Gen. George Washington. In the battle of Brandywine General La Fayette was wounded while rallying the American troops. He was also with Washington at Valley Forge. He received the thanks of Congress for his brilliant military conduct at Monmouth. In 1799, on the outbreak of war between England and France, General La Fayette returned to his native land and while there secured substantial aid for the Americans. He soon returned to this country and reentered the military service. He was a member of the court martial that condemned Major Andre to death. He commanded the American forces against the British under Benedict Arnold and rendered distinguished services as a sagacious and intrepid officer. In 1781 he again returned to France, but revisited America again in 1784, when he was received with great enthusiasm. The liberal views he imbibed in America enabled him to render valiant service in the assembly and in the armies of France.

In August 1824 La Fayette returned to the United States on the invitation of the President at the request of Congress and was received in various parts of the country with warmest expressions of delight and enthusiasm. Congress voted him a grant of $200,000 and a township of land, which extended 6 miles north and 6 miles east of the city limits of Tallahassee. The patent therefor was issued July 4, 1825. General La Fayette did not see his public-land grant, but utilized it through his agents, and he sent many settlers and their families to live in Florida.

The Lafayette Township is 1 north, 1 east from the base line and Tallahassee meridian, which is marked in the southeastern part of the city of Tallahassee for permanent use in determining Florida land lines. The entire area is occupied in prosperous Leon County homes, a part of the land having been incorporated within the Tallahassee city limits.

General La Fayette appreciated the grant and felt a pride in the township of land adjoining the capital of the then Territory of Florida; and he anticipated a visit to his valuable Florida possession, but on his return to France his time and talents were fully occupied until his death in Paris, May 20, 1834. Tallahassee, the capital of the State of Florida, duly observed May 20. The city authorities adopted the resolutions and took action as follows:

Whereas the distinguished and generous services of General La Fayette to our country and the township of land granted by Congress to General La Fayette in recognition of such services is in and near Tallahassee, the capital city of the State of Florida, and has added prominence and prestige to our county and city: Therefore, in recognition of such historic and elevating circumstances connected with this city, be it

Resolved by the City Commission of the City of Tallahassee, That the tract of land consisting of approximately 12 acres, lying east of Gadsden Street in the west half of the southwest quarter of section 30, township 1 north of range 1 east, property of the city of Tallahassee, which said land is situated in the western part of Lafayette Township grant and within the corporate area of the city of Tallahassee, be, and the same is hereby, perpetually dedicated for park purposes;

Resolved, further, That on and after the 20th day of May, A.D. 1934, the one hundredth anniversary of the death of General La Fayette, said park area shall be, and is hereby, officially designated and named La Fayette Memorial Park.

Passed the city commission on the 8th day of May A.D. 1934.

JNO. L. FAIN,
Mayor-Commissioner.

Attest:

B. H. BRIDGES,
City Auditor and Clerk.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3659) authorizing the Oregon-Washington Bridge Board of Trustees to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Columbia River at Astoria, Clatsop County, Oreg., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1197) thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 9002) to provide relief to Government contractors whose costs of performance were increased as a result of compliance with the act approved June 16, 1933, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1200) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 821) conferring jurisdiction on the United States District Court of the District of Oregon to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the suit in equity of Rakha Singh Gherwal against the United States, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1206) thereon.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 8912) to amend section 35 of the Criminal Code of the United States, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1202) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (S. 3495) to regulate commerce in petroleum, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1201) thereon.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H.R. 9371. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Douglas City, Alaska, to undertake certain municipal public works, including construction, reconstruction, enlargement, extension and improvements of its water-supply system; and construction, reconstruction, enlargement, extension, and improvements to sewers, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $40,000 (Rept. No. 1203); and

H.R. 9402. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Fairbanks, Alaska, to undertake certain municipal public works, including construction, reconstruction, and extension of sidewalks; construction, reconstruction, and extension of sewers, and construction of a combined city-hall and fire-department building, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $50,000 (Rept. No. 1204).

Mr. FESS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 3178) authorizing the George Washington Bicentennial Commission to print and distribute additional sets of the writings of George Washington, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1205) thereon.

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 203) increasing the limit of expenditures of the Special Committee to Investigate Bankruptcy and Receivership Proceedings, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 228) authorizing an investigation of the relationship existing between certain contractors and their employees in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BACHMAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 243) appointing a special committee to investigate certain charges against textbook concerns in connection with the obtaining of contracts for the sale of school books, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CLARK:

A bill (S. 3698) to amend the act of April 13, 1926, relating to grants of land to States and Territories which provide agricultural and mechanic arts colleges; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 3699) for the relief of Joseph Schoenbach; to the Committee on Claims.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. SHEPPARD, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3691) granting Stanley Harrison the privilege of filing application for benefits under the Emergency Officers' Retirement Act, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO PUBLIC GRAZING LANDS BILL

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 6462) to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. HEBERT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. VANDENBERG submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8687, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE N.R.A. AND FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as part of my remarks the report, dealing with freedom of the press, adopted at the recent annual meeting of the American Society of Editors in Washington.

Permit me to say in this connection that the report deserves the earnest attention of every thoughtful and patriotic citizen. All over the world we have seen personal liberty curtailed, in some countries practically abolished, in the last few years.

The first step in nearly every instance has been to muzzle the press. When freedom of the press goes, freedom of speech, freedom of assemblage, freedom of action such as is guaranteed by our Constitution and the Bill of Rights, inevitably follow.

It is not only entirely proper and fitting that editors and publishers should insist upon explicitly preserving the freedom of the press in any code or similar instrument drawn up; it is, and was at the time it was drawn, the duty of those editors. They should not have been criticized for protecting the freedom of press and speech.

At the same time, as a Senator and as a publisher, I wish to stress that the freedom of the press is a responsibility as well as a privilege, so far as editors and publishers are concerned. As was well stated at the recent sessions of the American Society of Newspaper Editors by Mr. Fred Fuller Shedd, editor of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin:

> This freedom of the press is not a privilege of newspaper publication, but rather it is a fundamental right of the people to voice their thought and desires as freely through the printed page as through the spoken word.

In other words, Mr. President, freedom of the press makes every newspaper and every editor a trustee for the preservation of that freedom of thought and expression, not for the newspapers really but for the people of the United States. I have always held that a newspaper really belongs to its community; the publisher is only the official vehicle to convey, to pass around, to disseminate, to discuss, to formulate, and allow the readers to formulate the hopes, the aspirations, the views, of the people of the community the newspaper serves.

It is the duty of the newspaper not merely to offer itself as an organ of expression for the voice of the people. It actually should encourage, promote, assist in every way possible the expression of the thought of the people. A newspaper should be the public forum where the voice of the people can be expressed freely and vigorously. The news presented today is on a higher plane than ever before. The newspapers are doing a real job of reporting the news of these critical times impartially and honestly. They are fighting vigorously to uphold the freedom of the press, to see that both sides of every argument are presented, so that the people can obtain full information and make up their minds on the merits of the question.

It is not my intention to enter into a prolonged discussion of the obvious duty of not only newspaper publishers but of the Congress and of the people to preserve at all times freedom of speech and press and to resist the slightest encroachment upon that freedom, whether intentional or inadvertent.

The report I send to the desk outlines our position in that respect completely and accurately, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF REPORT ON FREEDOM OF THE PRESS ADOPTED BY NEWSPAPER EDITORS

WASHINGTON, April 20.—The following report dealing with freedom of the press was adopted today by the American Society of Newspaper Editors:

In November 1933 the directors of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, meeting in Chicago, adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the National Recovery Act and its enforcement present possibilities of direct or indirect restriction of the freedom of the press; and

"Whereas it is beyond all question that the freedom of the press was guaranteed in the first amendment to the Constitution, not to confer a special and peculiar privilege upon the press, but in order to protect the fundamental rights and essential liberties of a free people; and

"Whereas there is an effort to create an opinion that special immunities and privileges are being sought for newspaper publishing as a business under the guise of defending the liberty of the press, making a specific statement of the position of this society desirable: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the American Society of Newspaper Editors considers it a matter of the utmost importance to the American people, as well as to the press, that the newspaper code now being formulated under the provisions of the National Recovery Act shall contain a specific statement on behalf of the Government, as one of the contracting parties, that the acceptance of a newspaper code is not intended to and shall not be construed as waiving, abrogating, or modifying the rights of free speech and the freedom of the press as these are guaranteed under the Constitutions of the United States and the several States."

REMOTE THREAT CONDEMNED

Before that time and thereafter members of the American Society of Newspaper Editors lifted their voices in constant and proper insistence that the constitutional prerogatives of a free press in the United States not only must undergo no modification but must not be subjected even to remote threat.

From August 1933 until the end of February 1934 a controversy, which at times assumed the proportions of battle, was waged between certain officers of the National Recovery Administration, notably Gen. Hugh Johnson, its chief, and a group of newspaper editors and publishers who carried in their minds and hearts unmistakable convictions as to the rights of newspapers under the Constitution and as to the eternal values inherent in a free press.

In the opinion of your committee the resolution of the directors of the society, and their accompanying resolutions, made an unmistakable contribution to the victory which was finally won by the adoption of a clause in the newspaper code restating and reenforcing the privileges of a free press as guaranteed by the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

In the opinion of your committee the resolution hereinbefore mentioned was a sound and worthy one and deserves the standardization and permanence which your adoption of this general report will bring to it.

It seemed to the committee to lie within its duty to review, for the purposes of clarity and for your information, the various steps and the progressive achievements which led up to the adoption and final acceptance on the part of the national administration of those guaranties upon which thoughtful newspapermen have been so earnestly insistent.

CHRONOLOGY OF NEWSPAPER CODE

The committee presents, then, herewith a chronological development of the code for daily newspapers, with special reference to the clause relating to the freedom of the press, article VII of the code.

On August 7, 1933, Elisha Hanson, counsel, presented to the executive committee of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, of which Howard Davis is chairman, a modification of the President's recovery agreement, or Blue Eagle code, for particular application to the newspaper industry. Certain paragraphs of his suggestions were adopted as representing the association's stand on the freedom of the press and incorporated in the code to be submitted.

On August 8 Mr. Hanson and the committee formally presented a modified code to Gen. Hugh Johnson, Recovery Administrator, in Washington. This code contains a paragraph, presented to Mr. Hanson and adopted by the committee, and is the paragraph with which this preliminary narrative is concerned.

TEXT OF ARTICLE VII

As article VII of the newspaper code finally adopted, it reads:

"Those submitting this code recognize that pursuant to section 10 of the act the President may from time to time cancel or modify any order approving this code, but in submitting or subscribing to this code the publishers do not thereby consent to any modification thereof, except as each may thereto subsequently agree, nor do they thereby waive any constitutional rights or consent to the imposition of any requirements that might restrict or interfere with the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of the press."

From September 21 to 23 a newspaper-code hearing was held in Washington under the direction of Prof. Lindsay Rogers, of Columbia University, as Deputy Administrator.

During the latter part of September and throughout October numerous informal and confidential conferences were held in Washington between the A.N.P.A. committee, headed by Howard Davis, and General Johnson concerning the newspaper code, and especially concerning the freedom-of-the-press section, to which section General Johnson vigorously and sometimes violently objected, and which, he declared, would not be included in the code with his approval.

LONG DEADLOCK RECALLED

The committee was equally insistent that the newspaper publishers would agree to no code which did not specifically reserve for the press its constitutional rights. To fail to assert those rights or to waive them, the committee contended, might cause them to be suspended or eventually to be forever lost. No agreement or understanding was reached at these conferences.

About the middle of December 1933, after the matter had lain in dormant state for many weeks, all the previous efforts to bring about agreement on the freedom-of-the-press provision having come to naught, the conferences were resumed. After new and continued negotiations with the A.N.P.A. committee, devoted to various sections and especially to the sections relating to child labor and the freedom of the press, an agreement was finally reached on the language of these sections. The fact that General Johnson was willing to agree to any sort of language guaranteeing constitutional rights was, of course, a distinct victory for the newspaper publishers and for editors. Much of the delay prior to the December conferences, as well as afterward, was due to numerous difficulties encountered in connection with the graphic arts code, which General Johnson insisted on considering simultaneously with the newspaper code, inasmuch as weekly and semiweekly newspapers were covered in the graphic arts code.

ON PRESIDENT'S DESK 5 WEEKS

On December 21 the revised newspaper code, containing article VII, hereinbefore mentioned, relating to the freedom of the press, was filed at the White House by General Johnson. The code as transmitted lay on the President's desk for 5 weeks before final action was taken.

On February 17, 1934, the President approved and signed the code and simultaneously made public his extraordinary Executive order, in the last paragraph of which he referred to the freedom-of-the-press clause in language which many editors and publishers have chosen to regard as gratuitous and exceedingly drastic. In the opinion of your committee, it is quite probable that the President did not write this Executive order, but merely signed a draft prepared and presented to him by General Johnson. It is customary for the Recovery Administrator to send to the President with each code the draft of an Executive order approving the recommendations and findings of the Administrator. The language of that part of the Executive order to which your committee draws your attention is as follows:

"Insofar as article VII is not required by the act, it is pure surplusage. While it has no meaning it is permitted to stand merely because it has been requested and because it could have no such legal effect as would bar its inclusion. Of course, a man does not consent to what he does not consent to. But if the President should find it necessary to modify this code, the circumstance that the modification was not consented to would not affect whatever obligations the nonconsenter would have under the National Industrial Recovery Act.

"Of course, also, nobody waives any constitutional rights by assenting to a code. The recitation of the freedom of the press clause in the code has no more place here than would the recitation of the whole Constitution or of the Ten Commandments. The freedom guaranteed by the Constitution is freedom of expression, and that will be scrupulously respected; but it is not freedom to work children or do business in a fire trap or violate the laws against obscenity, libel, and lewdness."

EXECUTIVE ORDER SIGNED

Although there is probability, as hereinbefore indicated by your committee, that the language is that of the Recovery Administrator, the President adopted it and signed the Executive order, making himself, of course, responsible for the unmistakable criticism.

On February 22 the full code committee of the A.N.P.A., together with the five regional code committees, met in New York to consider what should be done about the modification of the code made by the President's Executive order. Mr. Hanson presented a complete and illuminating statement concerning the effect of the Executive order on the code itself. He held that the effect, if assented to by the publishers, would be such as to deny the validity of article VII, which relates to the freedom of the press.

HOLDS ARTICLE NULLIFIED

In his concluding statement Mr. Hanson said as follows:

"The code committee, representing the newspaper publishers, has insisted upon the acceptance of article VII without qualification. If the code is assented to, with the qualification and modification of the President, in my opinion article VII has no force and no meaning whatsoever, and the President is correct in his statement that it has no legal effect."

On the same night, February 22, a committee representing the joint code conference went to Washington to acquaint General Johnson with the decision "that until the full force and meaning of article VII is conceded without qualification, this committee will not recommend to the membership of their various associations adherence to and compliance with the code."

In somewhat compliant and conciliatory mood General Johnson received this committee. The declaration agreed upon in New York was delivered. The Recovery Administrator sensed the seriousness of the publishers and with little delay agreed to the preparation of a supplementary order modifying the previous objectionable Executive order which, in the opinion of counsel, as stated earlier in this report, had the effect of nullifying article VII, relating to the freedom of the press. General Johnson even went so far as to ask the committee to submit suggestions for a modified order.

On February 24 the newspaper code committee submitted its suggestions to General Johnson for modification of the original Executive order which he sent to the President the same day. The President signed the order. He thus assured the acceptance of and compliance with the newspaper code by the code authorities and the newspaper publishers.

REVISED ORDER CITED

It is needless to reproduce here the new and modified Executive order in entirety, but your committee notes with satisfaction that the Executive order ends with this language:

"My comment with respect to article VII of the code of fair practice for the daily newspaper publishing business applies also to section 17 (b) of article I of the code of fair competition for the graphic arts industries, but said article VII of the code of fair competition for the daily newspaper publishing business and said section 17 of article I of the code of fair competition of the graphic arts industries are nevertheless, respectively, approved as submitted, without modification, condition, or qualification."

On March 12 the newspaper code became effective.

FULL AND FINAL VICTORY

The signing and promulgation of this new Executive order, accompanying the code, constituted a full and final victory for newspaper publishers and editors in their insistent and uncompromising demand for a definite code provision properly asserting and setting forth their constitutional rights.

This will forever rank in the history of American journalism as a memorable battle and a glorious victory for the continuance in this Nation of the freedom of the press.

To pass now to a further consideration of the relationship that exists between the press and the people of the United States, the committee brings to your attention certain conclusions. In the words of Mr. Elisha Hanson, counsel for the A.N.P.A., "the first amendment to the Constitution provides that Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech or of a free press. The specific terms of this amendment place the newspapers of this country in a position distinct as well as distinguishable from all other businesses.

"It must be assumed that a newspaper cannot be licensed if the possible revocation of the license might compel discontinuance of publication.

"Likewise it must be assumed that a newspaper cannot be compelled to join any particular economic group if the effect of such membership would be the suppression of editorial freedom or of the newspaper itself.

"The constitutional guaranty was not written for the benefit of newspapers but for the benefit of the people as a whole. However, the obligation of protecting the people's rights to a free press falls on the newspapers, and more specifically on each individual newspaper."

RESPONSIBILITY ACCEPTED

Your committee accepts this statement of the position and responsibility of the American press, and your adoption of this report will put the American Society of Newspaper Editors on record as adhering to it and permitting neither departure nor the threat of departure from these accepted prerogatives.

The first amendment to the Constitution not only forbids legislation abridging freedom of the press but the Supreme Court has held that constitutional rights are individual rights, which may be waived by an individual but for himself alone. This being the law and the fact, your committee holds that the matter of a newspaper's compliance with or noncompliance with a code promulgated under the National Industrial Recovery Act must be considered from the point of view of the individual newspaper and not from the viewpoint of any association or organization of publishers or editors.

It is, therefore, the conclusion of your committee that no matter what differences of opinion may arise from interpretation of the newspaper code in reference to article VII, touching the freedom of the press (although we believe that article safeguards our prerogatives), the ultimate right to freedom of editorial expression always resides and must always reside with the directing heads of each newspaper.

GUARDS FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

In short, the committee goes on record and calls upon this society to go on record as incontrovertibly against any possible or conceivable organized effort to modify in the slightest degree the traditional guaranties of the complete freedom of expression in American newspapers.

This committee notes with satisfaction that the daily newspaper code authority, upon which devolves the duty of passing upon all those relationships which exist or may arise between newspapers and the N.R.A., contains among its members, including the president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, men who have been consistently courageous and outspoken in the matter of the constitutional rights of newspapers. We look with favor and with full confidence upon the personnel and activities of the daily newspaper code authority.

This committee goes on record as opposed to the large powers that have been proposed for a Federal communications commission in Washington. Despite all safeguards hereinbefore mentioned, the likelihood that such a Federal communications commission might try to inflict a measure of censorship on the press, along with its domination of the telephone and radio business, is not too remote.

KNOX STATEMENT QUOTED

In this connection the committee wishes to quote from a recent statement of Col. Frank Knox, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, who says:

"The bureaucratic Federal control of all means of communication can readily be converted into an efficient machine for censorship overnight. That the desire exists to exercise such a censorship can no longer be doubted. It has shown itself in a dozen different directions.

"It was only through the insistence of the newspapers that a complete freedom of the press was maintained in the formulation of a newspaper code. If this new danger is to be averted, it will only be because the newspapers militantly oppose these latest plans of the power-hungry bureaucrats in Washington for complete domination under a centralized Federal bureaucracy.

"I have no fear that the proposed censorship can be established because I do not believe that an aroused public opinion will permit resort to precisely the methods employed by dictators in Europe to establish and maintain their supremacy. I utterly refuse to believe that fascism of this type is possible in America."

VALUE OF FREE PRESS ABROAD

This report passes now to the important consideration of the value of a free press abroad and the immeasurable value of a free flow of uncensored news in relation to international affairs and especially with reference to the danger of and preparations for war.

The committee includes here a statement from Carl W. Ackerman, dean of the School of Journalism of Columbia University, which it believes needs to be brought to the attention of the members of this society. It is devoted to the subject of the controlled press in certain foreign countries and the relation of that controlled press to an attack upon the peace of the world.

Dean Ackerman says:

"In domestic and foreign affairs the people of this country have learned how to make use of the free flow of daily news in forming their own opinions. This thought must have been in President Madison's mind more than a century ago when he said that knowledge is power.

"The press today is the power plant of democracy. By distributing information and by explaining governmental policies it has provided a common national and local forum of thought and debate. It has contributed to the formation of public opinion and in turn revealed that opinion to the Government and to the people. Today press reports of international events and public discussion provide that public knowledge which gives public opinion its power and authority.

"That we have in the United States today something akin to a parliament of the press is evident in the recent observation of Paul Grae, one of the editors of Politikin, of Copenhagen, who has been studying the United States under the new deal.

"'American newspapers', he said, are 'the voice of the people.' A trite phrase, he admitted, when applied without comparison to the press of the world, but vastly significant in international affairs today when related to the voice of dictators, censors, militarists, armament manufacturers, and selfish private interests in most countries.

"In Russia, Germany, and Italy the press today is controlled by the governments; in Paris, with possibly one or two exceptions, by manufacturers of war materials; in Japan, Spain, and practically all Latin American countries by military or political censors; in England largely by the aristocracy; in Central Europe and China, with few exceptions, by governments, censors, or foreign subsidies.

"The map of the world today is black with prohibitions upon freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, or petition, or of religion.

STRESSES CURBS ON LIBERTY

"Liberty in Latin or Anglo-Saxon form is limited everywhere excepting the United States, England, Australia, Canada, South Africa, Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and New Zealand. In these countries the press is either 'the voice of the people' or, as in England, it is open to the opinion of the people.

"I present this perspective of world journalism because I believe there is a direct relationship between the freedom of the press and peace between nations. The time has come for the American press to recommend and support a new American policy in foreign affairs.

"That there is a relationship between freedom and peace is obvious. The chief nations threatening world peace today are Germany, Japan, France, Italy, and Russia. In each of these countries the press is controlled by Government officials or militarists who have the power to declare war or force a declaration of war.

"The chief nations which want peace today are the British Commonwealth, the five small but free nations of Europe, and the United States. In these countries the press is free from governmental control or censorship. These are facts. What do they signify and what can we do if, as a free people, we want to keep out of another war or if we want world peace to be a reality instead of an ideal beyond realization?

LISTS FOUR-POINT SERVICE

"American journalism during the first 11 months of President Roosevelt's administration has served the people in four important respects.

"1. It has established as an American political principle that in time of a national crisis no Government official has either the right or the power to censor, control, or license the press;

"2. It has faithfully, accurately, and understandingly reported governmental action and policies. It has cooperated with President Roosevelt and his administration in restoring confidence and promoting recovery, and with equal fidelity it has reported and interpreted counter criticism and opinion;

"3. It has reported the truth about developments in Germany, as well as pro-Hitler and anti-Nazi propaganda. It has told the truth about the militarists of Japan and the Liberals as well. It has sensed and revealed the new liberalism in Russia which emerged when it was recognized by our Government; and

"4. In local affairs, conspicuously, but by no means exclusively, in Chicago and New York, it has been a decisive influence in cleansing municipal governments and in exposing and preventing graft in Federal relief agencies.

EFFECTS ON PEACE STRESSED

"This perspective of American journalism is important because it establishes the influence of a free press in public affairs and indicates something of the possibilities of a free press in world affairs.

"With this picture of American journalism in mind, what can and should we do, if anything, to try to prevent another World War and keep out of a war in the Orient or in Europe?

"There are several possible approaches to an answer, but the direct one is here at home. There are today innumerable peace societies, foreign-policy groups, League of Nations societies, institutes, forums, and agencies, schools, colleges, and universities, national and international councils studying, talking, writing letters, distributing pamphlets, and passing resolutions about peace.

"I speak not in ridicule, but with concern. What will it profit all of these agencies and all of our citizens who are participating or cooperating in their work if only the people of the United States, England, Canada, Denmark, etc., want peace and the people of other countries are powerless to prevent war? What are the scrapbooks of clippings from the press of free countries worth in a military market?

FACTOR IN WORLD AFFAIRS

"The perspective of peace advocates must be readjusted to new realism. They must consider the press not as a printing establishment to turn out clippings for their publicity files, but as a factor itself in international affairs quite apart from what it reports.

"The most important force in international affairs today is the foreign service of the American press associations and newspapers under the leadership and direction of men who are interested in and concerned with the free flow of information, rather than with any form of propaganda by, for, and of governments or political systems of peace societies.

"American newspaper correspondents abroad know from experience and as a result of daily contact with realties in every world capital that war follows the control of news as inevitably as darkness follows light.

"If there is a direct relationship between the freedom of information and peace, are we justified as newspaper men and as citizens in accepting foreign censorships or control of news destined for the United States? Is the rightful interpretation of the freedom of the press to be applicable only to our local and national problems? Must we conform to the unwritten law of European secret diplomacy that the press is a menace until it is fettered? Are we justified in permitting military-mad men in Germany, France, Italy, Japan, or Russia to set the stage for another war, to prepare for another war, and, when they are ready, to declare another war by the simple process of controlling information and manufacturing opinion while they build armaments and accumulate ammunition?

CHALLENGES DICTATOR CURBS

"Is it right for the free press of the United States to have its international news standards influenced or determined by dictators, militarists, and diplomats who attend conferences to block peace negotiations?

"Has not the time arrived for the press of the United States to demand freedom of the press in world affairs, at least, as far as every international conference or engagement of this country is concerned? Can we not insist that there must be a free flow of information to the American press?

"As an international policy there can be no greater safeguard of peace than the freedom of news throughout the world. Therefore, should not the press of America recommend that our own Government refuse to participate in any international conference without complete freedom of information for our own press associations and newspapers?

"If the United States Government were to take this stand, every other government in the world would be challenged by a new peace force. With Japan and Russia openly preparing for war, with Germany, Italy, and France secretly maneuvering for military and political advantages in Europe, and with other governments confronted with the necessity of reconstructing the League of Nations or acting alone, the people of the United States at least have the right to the full, free flow of information wherever our nationals or our governments are involved as concerned.

CALLS PREVENTION POSSIBLE

"International affairs are seldom wholly black until war is inevitable or a fact. Today it is still possible to prevent another world war. It may be possible to prevent local wars in the Orient and in Europe. Until both are impossible we, as a free people, have the right and the duty to launch peace ideas before we begin to launch airplanes and battleships on a war scale.

"I respectfully submit these thoughts to President Roosevelt as the basis for a policy of international realism anchored to the freedom of the press in the United States."

The committee herewith approves the statement and recommendations of Dean Ackerman, which are a part of this report, and requests the endorsement of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

In conclusion, may this committee on the press and public relations remind the members of the society that there are nearly 2,000 daily newspapers in the United States with circulations ranging from 1,000 copies to more than 1,000,000 copies daily. We believe that we should in this report stress the fact that in the year since we have met together American newspapers have given extraordinary support to the national administration. Largely free from partisan spirit, they have exercised their right to criticize details but have been sympathetic toward the general purposes of the Government.

ATTITUDE OF PATRIOTISM

There seems to have been almost unanimous agreement that the pressing needs of the country were paramount, that an unprecedented situation demanded unprecedented remedies, and that Government measures should be appraised in relation to the urgent necessities rather than upon normal considerations of their specific merits. This attitude has not been one of subserviency but of patriotism.

It is our opinion that the American press has rendered inestimable service to a distressed and bewildered people in the presentation and analysis of the revolutionary measures that have been proposed and adopted. The public has had to depend upon the press for information and interpretation, and this necessity has laid upon editors responsibilities and labors such as they have never borne before. The difficulties of interpretation in matters so novel and involving principles and circumstances so complicated, have been surmounted only by excessive study and thought.

Never has there been a time when information and intelligent comment were so necessary to the people. In the belief of this committee, the press has done more than the experts to clarify public questions.

Respectfully submitted.

AMERICANISM OF '76 AND 1934—ADDRESS BY SENATOR SCHALL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] before the Shrine Club of Philadelphia, May 23, 1934, on the subject of Americanism of '76 and 1934.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICANISM OF '76 AND 1934

In coming over to you from Washington this noon, I am impressed with the truth that the issues now confronting the Senate—not perhaps in surface form, but in ultimate purpose and result—are the fundamental issues on which your fraternal order is founded. The bills before us for legislative consideration may take a thousand forms and deal with the state of the Union from a myriad angles. But the fundamental purpose of all legislative inquiry and of all legislative action is or, if honest and patriotic, is presumed to be founded on the creed of the Shriner as related to government: Truth, justice, mercy.

Truth declares that man, endowed by the Creator with inalienable rights, may govern himself without a master; that he has no divine rights to govern others nor others any divine right to govern him. Falsehood in this fateful moment in our history declares from the very highest place that the Government must be supreme in interfering with or controlling the smallest details of our daily affairs. This is truth—God created man; man created government. The thing created can never be greater than the creator.

Justice holds a balance. It inclines neither to the right hand nor to the left. Injustice gives special privileges, weakens one to strengthen the position of another, and robs our people of their splendid spirit of initiative and daring, and the will to strive upward and onward forever. Injustice would make spineless creatures of an heroic people whose deeds have been unparalleled in all recorded history.

Mercy is not strained; it falls as the dew from heaven, noiselessly and refreshingly. Mercy makes us all king. Ruthlessness in government has slain millions in Europe. From such false sense of repressive authority we fled by millions in the past century.

May these who would poison our children's minds with doctrines of ruthless animalism; may these who would warp our youth and rob them of all reverence for our past; may these be condemned by aroused public opinion that will again lay our foundations for truth, justice, and mercy.

Never before in American history, since the Declaration of Independence was cradled here in Philadelphia in the Continental Congress of July 4, 1776, has the battle for the preservation of American liberty been so trying, and the cause so threatened, as it is in Washington at the present hour.

In all human relations, national or individual, the issue should be truth. Never before in the history of this Republic has there sat in Washington a dominant majority in control of the Federal Government, which, following the blind leadership of a so-called "brain trust", denies the Declaration of '76—denies the call of the founders, "We hold these truths to be self-evident", on which we won American liberty.

The issue in all lawmaking is justice. The preamble of our Constitution begins: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice" * * * but today, under the so-called "new deal", our Constitution stands suspended under the pretext of an "emergency" that is being daily augmented and expanded. The President in his message to Congress on January 3, 1934, demands that his emergency power shall be made permanent. That means that suspension of the Constitution is to be permanent.

Under the constitution of ancient Rome a dictatorship could last only 6 months. The name of a permanent dictator was emperor. Today, after the temporary dictatorship has run 9 months—or 90 days beyond the limit in ancient Rome—the demand comes that the emergency dictatorship shall be made permanent. In other words, the Constitution which begins, "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice"—shall be indefinitely suspended. Union and justice, government by consent of the governed, shall be indefinitely suspended at the will of the Executive. Instead of a government of law we have government by a ruler.

Should the issue be mercy? You may recall the statement of Chief Justice John Marshall in the famous United States Bank case, "that the power to tax is the power to destroy." In our school days we read the history of Magna Charta—how the farmer barons, tired of the tyranny of King John in seizing their property and enslaving them for taxes levied at his will, led him out to an island at Runnymede on the Thames and laid before him the historic document which transferred the taxing power to the Commons. That was the foundation of British liberty in 1215, and the foundation of American liberty in 1789 when the Constitution, article I, placed the revenue power, including tariffs and direct taxes, in the hands of Congress. Today we have before us in the United States Senate the demand that the revenue power of Congress shall be delegated to the White House. Mercy to the taxpayer, mercy to the tariff-protected industry, mercy to labor from competition with underpaid labor abroad shall be meted out, not by the constitutional method provided in article I pursuant to act of Congress, but by Executive edict as in the days of John I. In 1934 we have, if such bill passes, a Roosevelt, the second, with the revenue power of John I.

Congress and the country are faced today with the same issue of mercy from the taxing power that our fathers faced in 1776. You well recall the Boston Tea Party of 1774 against the levy of import duties by George III without the consent of the colonial assemblies. We still celebrate the wars of the American Revolution against the violation of Magna Charta—afterward embodied in our Constitution—the right of free men to representation, the consent of the governed, as a basis of merciful taxation. We thought that issue was settled at Yorktown when Cornwallis surrendered his sword. Today it reappears, not at Bunker Hill or Yorktown, not at Boston Harbor nor yet at Runnymede, but in the Capitol of the Nation. And the demand to reopen the issue and take from Congress its foremost power for existence comes from the White House itself—to bestow upon Roosevelt, the second, the unconstitutional powers of John I and George III.

Truth, justice, mercy—the whole foundation of the Mason—is threatened by the new deal of a so-called "super brain trust."

To Philadelphia this challenge to American institutions comes with peculiar force. The Declaration of Independence was drafted and signed in 1776, here in Philadelphia. The first protective tariff of American history was enacted in Pennsylvania in 1785—2 years before the Constitution. It was for years called the "Pennsylvania idea", before Henry Clay called the tariff the "American system."

That you know full well the import of the national issue now at stake is shown by the outcome of your recent State primary election. Philadelphia did not forget 1776, 1785, and 1787—as shown by the vote you gave for Senator DAVID A. REED. Yours was the Boston Tea Party of 1934.

My home is the State of Minnesota. Possibly there may be in your midst some veteran still living who remembers 1861. If so he may remember that the first regiment to respond to the call of Abraham Lincoln in that crisis of the Union was the First Minnesota.

This first regiment of Civil War volunteers was made up largely of Minnesota schoolboys, and their teachers represented many of the officers. On their way to Washington they passed through Harrisburg and Philadelphia. And as they passed through this great Keystone State they were hailed by the boys of Pennsylvania:

"We'll be with you, Minnesota; we shall join you on the way."

Then came the great outpouring of Pennsylvania volunteers. They asked for no Blue Eagle—the Stars and Stripes were good enough for them. They followed no academic "brain trust." Their gospel was the old foursquare gospel of 1776: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The history of that First Minnesota Regiment of 1861 soon became a memorable part of the history of Pennsylvania. Some here today may be familiar with that history. How, on the second day at Gettysburg, the turning point of the war for the Union, the First Minnesota was sacrificed to stay the advance of Pickett's Confederate brigade of 15,000.

The Confederate charge was directed against the battery on the ridge where the First Minnesota stood guard. General Hancock needed 30 minutes to bring up the reserve. The rebel 15,000 must be stopped and not a minute lost.

Galloping to the front, Hancock shouted, "What regiment is this?"

"First Minnesota" was the answer.

Shouted Hancock, "First Minnesota, double quick, charge!"

And down the hill went the 600 in the face of the rebel 15,000.

Some fell on the way. Some barricaded themselves behind rocks in the dry creek at the foot of the ridge and made their stand.

They won their victory. The little line held just long enough until the Union reserves swept on the field, and the Battle of Gettysburg turned the tide of war for the cause of the Union.

But the First Minnesota which charged down the hill at Gettysburg that day with banners flying and shouts of victory did not come back as they went down. Of that 600 only 57 survived. The blood of over 500 is still incorporated in the soil of Pennsylvania.

But they won their victory. They won it for the flag of the Union. They won it for the truths of '76. They won it for the justice pledged by their Constitution. They won it for mercy to 4,000,000 slaves. They won it for every principle on which the Shriner stands and for every principle on which the American patriot stands. And what those schoolboys did for country in 1861 we, their descendants and compatriots, can do again, and are sworn under our oaths to the Constitution to do again when the Republic calls upon us, as it now calls in 1934.

In the war for the Union of 70 years ago it was the Gettysburg of 1863 that led the way to the Appomattox of 1865. The year 1934 may be the Gettysburg of a victory for American liberty in 1936. In faith, hope, and charity—in truth, justice, and mercy—let us pray that American history will repeat itself, that the Constitution which guarantees truth, justice, and mercy to every individual may not be ruthlessly swept aside and in its place reared some hideous, grinning, regimented, lock-stepping, soul-crushing monster whose grasping animalism will crush out all initiative, all liberty, all rights of the individual to grow a soul, all chance of the individual to advance and germinate an understanding that he thereby might some day be fit to stand in the presence of God, upon whom our faith and the foundation of this very organization rests, and upon whose guidance in truth, justice, and mercy our great Republic relies, as even our dollar bears witness, "In God we trust."

A NEW DEAL PROGRAM OF PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD speeches made at a luncheon under the auspices of the People's Lobby, Inc., at the Cosmos Club, Washington, D.C., May 19, 1934, on a New Deal Program of Public Ownership.

There being no objection, the speeches were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dr. John H. Gray, former president of the American Economic Association, who was chairman, said:

"That no nation can endure or last long with as great fluctuations in prices as we have had in the last 20 years is now plain to all. Nor can a nation prosper or enter safely into long-time contracts without a high degree of stability in prices. So long as business is carried on for profit, prices will depend on the amount of money, or purchasing power, offered for goods and services at any one time. Our money today—that is, purchasing power offered for goods and services—consists more than 90 percent of bank checks. Checks are drawn against deposits. But deposits arise chiefly from bank loans. Bank loans, at present, are granted by about 15,000 separate banks, most of them with but little knowledge of general currency needs, and each of them willing to increase bank loans without regard to general needs for currency, if the banker can make a profit thereby. Furthermore, as the chance of profit increases, he grants loans on nonliquid securities, and ties up his resources indefinitely. His only chance of getting money enough to pull through depends on the probability that other bankers will not do what he has done, and will thus forego the chances of extra profit that he has seized. Recent history shows that such a supposition has no basis in fact; thus a great rivalry grows up in granting loans, and prices go up and up until the bubble bursts, prices collapse, and general bankruptcy follows with its unemployment, reduction of production, bread lines, and general disorganization and depression such as our condition today. All our fundamental economic theories are exploded.

"The $6,000,000,000 inflation provided for in the Banking Act of 1933 was provided in order that the banks might loan more to business men to start the industrial machine, employ more men, and raise prices. But the fact is that loans decreased instead of having increased and the money piled up in the banks. It is said that even the hundreds of millions of dollars paid to farmers to restrict crops in order to raise farmers' prices, go primarily into the banks and remain there. The minute those checks come, the bankers threaten to foreclose mortgages and call other overdue debts. Therefore, these payments instead of putting money into circulation, raising prices, and giving employment, are simply credited on the farmer's debts and are added to the already plethoric stores of cash in the banks. These payments, like the $6,000,000,000 inflation fund, do not put money into circulation but add to the pickled money already in the banks.

"Without any change in the law or in the Federal Reserve bank regulations, without endangering our gold supply, we have surplus reserve enough—that is, surplus above what our laws require, and what safe banking requires, to quadruple the amount of our circulating medium in a day, if the bankers who hold that $1,700,000,000 surplus reserve could see their way to make a profit by making loans to the business world. This surplus reserve would justify additional loans to about $17,000,000,000. This is approximately three times the money in circulation today.

"I predict that we shall never have recovery, never have prosperity or happiness until commercial banking is entirely separated from investment banking, and all commercial banking is owned and operated by the Federal Government. When so owned and operated, it must be operated primarily for public welfare, and not for profits. All long-time or investment institutions must either be owned and operated by the Federal Government, or must be so regulated that all such loans shall be made from savings, and not from bank credit, as was done in the last decade, to the break-down of our whole banking system.

"The right to regulate and fix the value of money given to the Federal Government by the Constitution necessarily gives the right to control bank credit—the basis of most of our purchasing power—or money. All history shows that such credit cannot be controlled so long as it is left in the hands of thousands of separate privately owned and managed competing banks, for the sole aim of each bank is the making of private profit.

"The central bank of no nation except ours is actuated to the same degree as our banks, by the profit motive. When private profit is the main motive of any bank, that bank cannot be trusted to determine or to influence in a large way the total amount of bank loans in a country, for that is to determine the prices of commodities and service, and stable prices mean prosperity, and highly fluctuating prices mean speculation, bankruptcies, unemployment, depression, hunger, and disaster.

"Let us continue to borrow money, if need be, to feed the people, but let us realize once for all that there is no salvation or permanent welfare possible till all commercial bank credit is managed directly by the Federal Government. This is the key to recovery and to all other reforms. Without this, all other efforts to save our civilization are in vain."

Senator BRONSON W. CUTTING, of New Mexico, discussing Nationalizing Bankingy and Credit", said:

"For a year or more we have been engaged in currency manipulation. We have juggled with the currency, and we shall no doubt continue to do so. The results have been small. The depression is still with us, and it is doubtful if we can cope with it by any such methods.

"The reason is that only a small part of our monetary system consists of currency. Much the greater part is made out of bank credit. Until the Government takes control of this most vital part of our financial system, it is not going to break loose from the burden of debt which is weighing down the Government as well as the private citizen of the Nation.

"Most people think of banking as a terribly complicated subject, a subject which they cannot even attempt to understand. It is complicated in its details, but it has been part of the bankers' conspiracy to confuse the public by a discussion of the details so that they may lose sight of the main outlines. Those outlines are very simple, and they vitally concern the life and happiness of every human being in the civilized world.

"Since 95 percent of our money is made up of bank deposits, it is important to understand just what these bank deposits are. Of course, part of them, the smaller part, comes from the bank's customers, who deposit cash or check for safekeeping with the bank. But by far the greater part of these deposits are not deposits at all, in the real sense of the word. They come from the right given to a bank to loan 10 times, or 20 times, as the case may be, the amount of its reserves.

"If you go into a bank and borrow a thousand dollars, what happens? Of course the bank may give you the thousand dollars over the counter. But that seldom happens. Practically always you are satisfied by having the bank place the thousand dollars to your account. In that case the bank writes your name at the top of a column in its book as having made a deposit of a thousand dollars. The thousand dollars is not transferred from any other account. It is made out of thin air. To that extent it increases the total amount of money in existence. To that extent it raises the price level and changes the value of the money in the country. Yet the Constitution of the United States provides that 'the Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof.' In practice the Congress regulates the value of only a small fraction of the total amount of money in the country. The rest is regulated by the bankers.

"We are so used to this kind of transaction that we seldom stop even to question it. We allow the bankers to inflate our money each time they make a loan and to deflate it each time the loan is called.

"And, of course, there is another very important feature connected with this loan of a thousand dollars. When you get it, you generally have to deposit with the bank collateral security of double the value of the loan. If you have a $2,000 house, you will probably be obliged to mortgage it for the privilege of obtaining $1,000, and, mark you, of paying interest when the loan falls due. Yet the only piece of real value which has entered into the transaction is the value which you yourself have put into it, your house and lot, or the Liberty bonds, as the case may be. You are paying tribute to a private institution for the right to use your own credit. Your credit depends on your own property, which really means your ability to deliver goods or service as required. The bank has contributed nothing of this sort. Yet in order to use your own credit you are forced to pay interest to a nonproductive agency. The bank has actually lent you your own credit and made you pay for getting it.

"In the main the interest of the banker is opposed to that of the general community. He is lavish with credit in good times, when it is not needed, and he withholds it in bad times, when it is a necessity. Someone has said that the banks lend you an umbrella in fine weather and take it away from you when it rains. Furthermore, the bankers of the United States, even if we grant them the best intentions in the world, are not in a position to work in cooperation in support of any definite policy. They have the power to issue vastly more credit than is ever actually necessary. Sometimes they do this. At other times they issue so little that the economic system cannot be carried on. Then we get starvation in the midst of plenty, such as we are enjoying at the present day.

"Our bankers may be compared to a number of theater agents, each of whom is authorized to sell an indefinite number of tickets in a theater. The total seating capacity of the theater, we will say, is 3,000. If 500 tickets are issued, or if 6,000 tickets are issued, the results are equally disastrous. It is a hit-and-miss method.

"In my judgment, the only agency which should be authorized to issue tickets for the national theater is the Nation itself. Call these 'tickets' 'tokens', or 'scrip', or 'dollars', as you will. The National Government must decide as to how many are needed.

"For, mind you, it is not merely the private individual who is forced to pay tribute to this strange, unreasonable system. The great industries, the great producers of the country, who are creating their share of the national credit, have each one of them to pay tribute to a bank in order to make use of the credit which they are creating.

"And what about the Government itself? Here we have a financial crisis, due in large measure to the stupidity of the bankers, and the futility of the system under which they are working. The purchasing power of the country has dwindled to a vanishing point. Millions upon millions are out of work and have no means of support. The Government is fulfilling its primary duty when it comes to the rescue of these people. The amount that we are spending for public works and relief may seem large when figured in dollars and cents, but it is not a drop in the bucket compared to the credit of this country as measured in its natural resources, in its plants, and in its man power. Yet what does the Government do when it goes to the rescue of its needy and starving citizens? It floats loans through the banks. It pays interest to private organizations for the use of its own credit. The thing becomes still more preposterous when we realize that an enormous proportion of the relief expended by the Government has gone to the aid of the great banking institutions. So that actually the Government of the United States is getting itself into debt to the banks for the privilege of helping them to regain their stranglehold on the economic life of a community.

"Up to April 30, this year, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had advanced to banks and trust companies about $1,553,000,000, and to other financial institutions nearly $700,000,000, of which only a little over half has been repaid.

"To my mind, this situation should have been stopped in March 1933. The bankers were then helpless and hopeless. They thought the end had come. They would themselves have welcomed a liquidation of their assets in favor of the Government. Now it will be more difficult. Yet the logical situation remains the same, and we are going to have to reestablish in the hands of the Federal Government the right which the Constitution placed there in the first place.

"I am now preparing a bill which is intended to accomplish this result. I wish that we might have the chance to vote on it at the present session. If that is impossible, it will be largely due to the lack of public interest and public understanding on the subject. The creation of a national bank which will eventually have a monopoly of the issuance of credit is, to my mind, the most vital need of the country today. I do not mean that that alone will get us out of the depression, but it is the first step in that direction, the first step without which none of the other can be taken.

"The ultimate control rests today neither with the people nor with the representatives of the people, but with a body of private citizens who, no matter how high-minded they may be as individuals, are responsible to no one but themselves. Let us as free Americans resume that ultimate control of the distributive system which the fathers of our Republic intended us to have."

Senator GERALD P. NYE, of North Dakota, speaking on Capitalization and Public Ownership, said:

"A study of capital structure in American industry all too clearly reveals the need for vast reform if we are ever to enjoy a measurable degree of prosperity for the people. In 1931, for example, corporations with capital assets of $50,000,000 or more numbered 632. These 632 corporations possessed over half of the total assets of all corporations. These 632 paid over three-fifths of the total of corporation cash dividends paid during the year, and included all the large financial, industrial, railroad, power, and natural resource enterprises.

"The power and influence exercised by these few giants are all too evident. It can fairly be said that the destiny of the economic structure of America is in the hands of these few. Into their capital structure there has been poured much water. Upon this water and the true values involved selling costs and prices are based. These prices enter very largely into the lives of all Americans and in a great measure determine their prosperity. It was a terrific overload of this sort that the people found upon their backs in 1929, which caused the crash from which we have not even yet recovered. And we are not going to recover until we can sluff off that part of capital structure which is representative of anything other than true wealth invested in actual and productive values.

"In these manipulated markets of 1925 to 1929 we never asked questions about the real values in a share of stock. We did not stop long enough to learn what were the earnings of the concern in which we bought an interest. We but wanted to know how much the price of a share of stock had jumped the day before, and the manipulators saw to it that a healthy gain was shown.

"This mad race for easy money, while the manipulators at the pumps were busy pumping water into capitalization and creating, through mergers and otherwise, false and fictitious valuations for industrial enterprises, found capital withdrawn from worthy fields and interest and solicitation lost for fundamental and honest industry.

"It is quite proper to say that factors within our economic structure for those years leading up to 1929 were bent upon destroying it from within and succeeded in no uncertain measure. Yet we speak of our economic structure as having suffered a break-down in 1929 as though some force from outside had moved upon the structure with malice and intent to crush it.

"Likewise, we refer to those years between 1915 and 1929 as the years of our greatest prosperity, while, as a matter of fact, they were years in which the few were reaping great harvests while the interests of the masses of the people were ruthlessly ignored and while our economic structure was actually in the throes of death and destruction.

"Ignoring of these truths and refusing to face these facts would afford some amusement were it not for the fact that we are today devoting our national energy in a great drive to win new and renewed life for our economic structure with the fiction rather than the truth of 1915 to 1929 as our blueprint. It follows that we waste these energies. Economic recovery will never be accomplished by construction upon the drifting and uncertain sands washed up by the boom days—those days of our so-called 'greatest prosperity.'"

Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary of the People's Lobby, speaking on What Congress Should Do Now on Public Ownership, said:

"Various experiments which have been tried since March 4, 1933, have proven not to meet the situation. It is absolutely necessary that there should be an immediate and drastic redistribution of the national income through taxation, repealing at least $1,000,000,000 of Federal consumption taxes, and taking at least $3,000,000,000 more of income of the wealthy through increased surtaxes, estate taxes, and taxation of corporation liquid surpluses and profits.

"The total increase in pay rolls and the increase in purchasing power of the farmer through processing taxes on farm products, since March 1933, are not as much as the Federal Government and local governments have spent on relief of the unemployed and in credit for public works and construction. The Monthly Survey of Business of the American Federation of Labor for May points out that although there was an increase in employment up to October 1933, hundreds of thousands of people have been laid off since then. This report also points out that although the wages of many employees have increased, the increase in costs of living has been so heavy that there has been no increase in purchasing power. In 1931 and 1932 the value of public works was between 2 and 2½ times as great as the value of public works last year, when the figure was only $1,300,000,000. Our experience has shown us that the Government alone can employ those who must be reemployed. At least 6,000,000 people will remain unemployed unless the Government employs them. The Federal Government should, at once, not only investigate the capital structure of corporations so that excess capitalization may be written down, as Senator NYE suggests, and make banking and the issuance of credit a Federal nonprofit institution, as Senator CUTTING has urged, but should take over and operate the railroads, all natural resources—such as coal, water power, oil, and natural gas—and other basic industries. Congress should also before adjournment enact the Frazier-Sinclair bill creating a Government Marketing Corporation, empowered to purchase, process, and sell farm products to the ultimate consumers. Voters should insist Congress remain here till this program is enacted into law."

WHERE IS THE NATION HEADING?—ARTICLE BY SECRETARY ICKES

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, in the New York Times of Sunday, May 27, 1934, appeared an article entitled "Where Is the Nation Heading?" by Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior. Secretary Ickes in his discussion contrasts the "old deal" and the "new deal." He is a member of the President's Cabinet and prior to that was a lifelong Republican and progressive.

I ask unanimous consent that his article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, May 27, 1934]

WHERE IS THE NATION HEADING?—SECRETARY ICKES, ANSWERING THE QUESTION AND REPLYING TO CRITICS OF THE NEW DEAL, SAYS WE ARE MOVING TOWARD A DAY OF SOCIAL-MINDEDNESS IN BUSINESS LIFE AND OF HAPPIER LIVING FOR ALL

By Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior

The answer to the question, "Where are we headed?" is a simple one, although it must necessarily be expressed in general terms. We are headed toward the goal of the greatest happiness for the greatest number of our people. And that is where we ought to be headed if we have any decent regard for the welfare of others or any intelligent concern for our own best interests.

After all, the human race has always been headed toward this same goal. There have been times when, in our quest for the greatest good of the greatest number, we have found ourselves standing still, mistakenly believing that at last we have reached the end of the long trail. At other times we have strayed into the wrong path through listening to false shibboleths or following ignorant or selfish leadership, only to bring ourselves up on the brink of an abyss.

On such occasions the progress back to the right path which, whether we consciously will it or not, we shall follow to the end, has been slow and painful and beset with dangers. But we have never lost hope, we have never been ready to call quits. Always the human race has gone forward, and always it will go forward. That persistent, unconquerable urge to make it possible for our children to lead fuller and richer lives than we ourselves have been able to live is a spiritual quality that distinguishes man from the rest of the animal kingdom.

In our attempt to say where we, as a nation, are now headed, it may be well to consider briefly where we were headed before we changed our direction on March 4, 1933. For almost 4 years before that day we had been drifting, going nowhere at all. Caught in the worst economic jam the country had ever known, we were milling around in a confusion that grew steadily worse. And throughout the 8 years before that, ending in the fatal autumn of 1929, we had been wandering in a fool's paradise of false prosperity and hastening directly for the jam.

In 1929 we had strayed far from the path which the Nation at the start had marked out for itself. We were spiritually drunk. We were living, so we assured ourselves, in a new economic era, an era that was the ultimate goal of human aspiration. The old simple virtues seemed outworn; they seemed quaint relics of a naive earlier generation. To the accompaniment of blaring jazz we refused any longer to take thought for the morrow. Brought up under a strict injunction to live within our incomes and save for a rainy day, we were encouraged even by bankers to withdraw our savings and invest them in insecurities.

It is not without significance that the latest Pulitzer prize for editorial writing went to the country editor who took for his subject the question, "Where is our money?" and answered by saying, "We spent it." Precisely so; and as individuals and communities we dissipated our credit also. Did we need extra funds to pay for our joy ride that was to stretch beyond the far horizon? Any stockbroker would open a trading account on a slender margin, permitting us to buy stocks and commodities that we never proposed to take title to, or to sell what we never expected to own. The way to keep the frenzied dance going was to buy what we neither wanted nor could afford.

In order to stimulate the purchase of the excess products of our industrial system our financial wizards invented the plan of installment buying, thus enticing people to pyramid purchases of unnecessary goods just as they were pyramiding speculative purchases of securities and commodities. The waitress in the restaurant took advantage of any lull to rush for a look at the stock ticker. The elevator boy on his way to becoming a capitalist passed along market tips to the janitor, who eagerly placed a second mortgage on his home in order to play them.

We dwelt in air castles and spent our days nervously clutching, like monkeys, at the narrow white ribbons on which the busy ticker was imprinting symbols indicating prices of stocks on the New York Exchange. Everyone might become rich without effort. In our haste to get our share we took no heed for the future nor felt any concern for our neighbor. We boasted, and honestly believed, that a miraculous new kind of era had come; an era of physical comforts and material luxuries; an era, we were told, of chicken dinners and two-car garages for all.

In those wild days we lost sight of spiritual values or deliberately ignored them. Racketeers flourished, and we read of their deeds with half-amused tolerance. We made heroes and prophets of clever crooks who were able to build up fortunes outside the law. We condoned the misdoings of men in high public office. "Why shouldn't they get theirs, too?" We were vexed at honest men who insisted upon exposing such outrages as the Teapot Dome steal. Provided we were acquiring wealth, either actually or on paper, we did not care what others, like minded, were doing. There was enough to go around, and the chief end of man was to glorify gold and get all he could of it.

After the World War, when our country was spiritually deflated and emotionally exhausted, our leaders had proceeded to take us back to "normalcy." An inspiring slogan that, to appeal to the spiritual quality in man! Our statesmen were perfect for their decade. It is only fair to say that had they attempted to lift their voices in deprecation of the materialism of the age no one would have heeded them. They and their public thoroughly understood one another.

"Get while the getting is good" became the national motto. Laissez-faire was on the throne. National leaders seemed great to the crowd if they simply let the crowd alone, and greatest of all seemed those who cheered on the orgy of speculation from the sidelines and issued encouraging statements whenever the stock market showed signs of fatigue.

At a time when we desperately needed the right kind of leadership to restore us to some degree of sanity, we had no leadership except the materialistic sort. If statesmanship implies an ability to peer even a little way into the future, we had no statesmanship. We had Presidents merely because, under our form of government, we are required to have Presidents.

During that materialistic decade few people thought of asking, "Where are we headed?" It is a hopeful sign that the question is asked so often today. Many people ask it sincerely, in profound concern for their country. They are still shaken by the crash of 1929; they are still appalled at what they saw when the awakening from the crazy dream of the nineteen twenties came at last. It is a question that every citizen with any patriotism in his soul ought to be asking. For not all of us have repented of those days or will admit that they were evil. Not all of us have forgotten the fleshpots.

Significantly, those who most sharply and even threateningly demand, "Where are we going?" are men who were political leaders of that era of folly. They are newspapers that sang paeans of praise of that era while it lasted. They are bankers and brokers and captains of industry who led that mad-dervish dance. The implication in the question, as they ask it, is that we were dwelling in peace and happiness; that all was right with the world until March 4, 1933.

Yet the question is a proper one, even though it is most frequently asked for the ulterior purpose of covering up the defects and the crimes of an economic period that constitutes a blot on our national history—a blot that will take more than one generation to wipe out. All of us are rightly, if anxiously, concerned over what lies ahead for us.

Just where, then, are we headed? First, and unmistakably, we are headed back from that make-believe land of mirages and will-o'-the-wisps where, 10 years ago, we hoped to establish ourselves permanently. We are retracing our erring footsteps, and it is hard going. At the same time, in my firm belief, we are entering a period of sound and genuine well-being; a period illuminated by our recent discovery that we cannot safely disclaim social responsibility for our acts in the economic world and that we cannot truthfully assume that we are not our brother's keeper.

We have learned much about economics since we went on that 12-year detour of ours. Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson had tried to teach us, and we promptly forgot. We had to go down into the depression to learn our lesson. And now, as we struggle back to the highroad where we should have been traveling all the while, we humbly and thoughtfully take up again our traditional task of making our country a good place to live in for every man, woman, and child.

To itemize some of our major objectives: We want to make sure, by adopting the pending constitutional amendment, that child labor in this land will be abolished forever. We must do away with sweatshops. We must protect women workers from unreasonably long hours of toil at tasks beyond their strength.

We would see to it that every man or woman who works does so in wholesome surroundings and for wages that will provide the necessities of life and leave something over for modest pleasures and luxuries. We say that workers should have a share of leisure to enjoy the American civilization they help to build; that it is not enough any more that any worker in a land of plenty should derive from a life of toil only the bare privilege of staying alive to toil. We would require employers to recognize the legitimate demands of labor, and we would require labor, on its part, to be reasonable and just.

Generally, we are headed toward a day of social consciousness in our business dealings with one another. Whether that goal can be reached by our people voluntarily, or whether some measure of social control will be necessary remains to be seen. We declare, however, that our economic system shall no longer run wild periodically, ruining itself and throwing millions of us out of work. The day will come, I hope, when that system will be so enlightened as to see that it can best serve self-interest by serving the common welfare and when it can be trusted to regulate itself.

We have given it every opportunity in the last year to effect reforms of its own volition; we have even lifted old and vital laws to help it meet the emergency. If that experiment, conceived and conducted in good will, has erred, it has erred, I believe, on the side of lenity. It may be found that large monopolistic business has seized unfair advantages over little business. It may be that management today lacks the ability to organize itself to cooperate for the common good. In that case there is only one agency strong enough to undertake the task, and that is the Government. Through harsh experience we have come to see that it is the right and the duty of the community to intervene in whatever may be harmful to the good of the people.

As a Nation alert at last to dangers long ignored, we would strengthen our banking system so that never again will innocent depositors lose their savings as the result of incompetent or dishonest banking methods. While permitting the stock and commodity markets to perform the rightful functions which only they can perform, we would put laws on the statute books to prevent another such delirium of irresponsible gambling as that which contributed so heavily to the crash of 1929. Through legislation we would save honest business from the old lethal operations of financial pirates and the securities exchanges.

We would make it impossible for a handful of ruthless, predatory men to accumulate immense fortunes through exploiting less fortunate people in no position to protect themselves. We believe the day is over in America when men who are extravagantly rewarded for their skill in serving their special group at the expense of all other groups can hope to escape social censure.

In taxation we are headed toward new laws that will discard the time-honored principle of "soak the poor." By a just and fair system we would, for the common welfare, assess taxes in proportion to ability to pay. In the public realm we would conserve our natural resources and prevent waste and reckless exploitation, at the same time drawing upon those resources for legitimate needs.

We look forward to cleaning up slum areas in cities and countryside; to bringing farm prices into fair relation with factory prices and otherwise aiding our greatest and worst-stricken industry to rehabilitate itself. We propose to inaugurate a system of old-age and unemployment insurance, realizing that this is the most economical and self-respecting method of meeting an obligation which society must somehow meet in the end. We want to provide schooling facilities ample to educate every child to his capacity to absorb and use an education. And our aim in foreign affairs is to play a generous and honorable role as a means of maintaining peace throughout the world.

To attempt to forecast the future of the Public Works program is not for one so closely identified with that program as I am. Some of the severest criticism today is directed at the Government's large-scale effort to create jobs for the millions of workers who were left idle by the collapse of the old economic order and at the same time to produce permanent social gains under the most careful supervision possible for us to establish in housing and other construction, in water power, flood control, land reclamation, reforestation, and like projects.

I would only say that it is unthinkable to me that before business has absorbed a greater part of the unemployed this Nation will abandon its policy of standing by those of its citizens who are still without means of sustenance, through no fault of their own. I regard the continuance of this work, even the increase of it, if necessary, as the Nation's first duty. To be parsimonious in this respect at this time will be at the cost of human suffering and will, in my judgment, gravely retard recovery.

It is asked whether industry, with its increasing use of labor-saving inventions and its new economical methods of distribution, can ever again absorb all of our unemployed. Possibly, as the years go on, the Nation will have to create and support new and useful public services, such as some of those under the C.W.A. and the C.C.C., in order to provide honorable work for all. That is a question for the future.

These are some of the goals toward which we are headed. Utopian goals? Yes, utopian indeed; but I do not apologize for suggesting that utopia is a proper goal for us to strive for and that we are worthy of such a realm if we can achieve it. We are a spiritual people, and life for us would not be worth living if we did not have this urge to reach for what will always seem beyond our reach. If we cannot have it for ourselves, we want it for our children, those projections of ourselves into immortality.

As a people, on election day of 1932, we willed that the advances listed here should come to pass. Despairing of the sordid policies that had led us to the verge of ruin, we turned our eyes for salvation to the long-neglected fundamental ideal of our Nation—the ideal of the greatest good for the greatest number; the ideal of government of, by, and for the people.

Thousands of us, self-seekers of every kind—and that includes most of us—wondered that we had forgotten it so long. We wondered that never before had it been so clear to us that the welfare of each of us depends on the welfare of all of us, and that the forceful, the shrewd, the successful, and the fortunate among us are safe only when all of the people are safe.

For a year and more that ideal has lighted our national course. It has inspired every step taken by the Government in the huge labor of repairing the wreckage left by the blind and selfish forces that brought us to the catastrophe of 1929 and the desolation of 1932. But now that further ruin is stopped and recovery begins to come, those same forces are pulling themselves together, viewing with alarm and uttering cries calculated to frighten the faint-hearted.

According to them, we are headed for paternalism, regimentation, socialism, communism, and a dictatorship; we are moving toward bureaucracy, the authoritarian state, the iron hand of government in business, the abrogation of the sacred right of individual initiative, rule by people with brains, the scrapping of the Constitution, and the scuttling of our free democratic order—to mention but a few of the bogies they raise to startle us.

These advocates of the economic anarchy of the nineteen twenties, asking us to forget what their system did to us, would have us think that we are headed for dreadful goals, indeed, and that we had better put ourselves quickly under their beneficent guidance again. Resorting to a mossy stratagem that worked well for them in the gilded past, they would pin the badge of bolshevism on the new deal.

But they offer no substitute for the new deal except an invitation to us to return to the old deal, and this they do in the name of patriotism. They offer themselves as saviors of our cherished democracy from its foes. They do not seem to know that this democracy has never been more alive and hearty and able to defend itself than in this year of 1934. Criticism is expected and welcomed in a republic, and one does not like to accuse critics of sinister motives. But surely there is more in the minds of these particular critics than mere Bourbon inability to learn.

Paternalism? I wonder how much of it the American people would stand if an attempt were made to force it upon them. Regimentation imposed by authority would have as small a chance with us. As a people we regiment ourselves cheerfully in times of national emergency. We did so in the World War. In the present crisis the policies we are following were willed by a free people glad to practice self-restraint and cooperation for the national welfare.

President Roosevelt said: "Here is the situation. There may be a way out if we all work together. Will you help?" The affirmative response was fairly unanimous. The administration has imposed nothing that the people did not ask for. It is but carrying out their mandate.

Oddly, a considerable part of the alarm sounded today against "regimentation" comes from the group of industrialists who have done more to regiment us and constrict individuality than any other influence among us. I think of their vast factories and the men and women at work there at the machines performing monotonous sets of operations day after day through their working lives. Men who have made robots of so many of our people might well think twice before they accuse others of regimentation.

If you call it voluntary self-restraint for the common good, I should say that we are headed for that. The opposition to such a move is bitter, of course. The cry about the loss of our individual initiative and the curtailment of our proud democratic freedom is particularly agitated and anguished. But a democracy that resolves to abolish piracy and other uneconomic practices of its antisocial members does not thereby impair any respectable right of any individual. It only increases the chance of the multitude of individuals to find their due share of happiness.

We have learned in these hard years that laissez-faire, the system of letting the strong alone to do as they will, in the hope that somehow good will come from it to all of us, is a pernicious doctrine in an age when the individual's potentialities for doing social harm are immensely multiplied, as they are in the machine age. We have learned that "the pursuit of self-interest is not an assurance of national prosperity."

As we try to apply this new discovery to our shattered economic life there arises an outcry about a dictator in the White House. It is hard for some to grasp the very clear fact that the voice "dictating" is the voice of democracy itself, speaking through its chosen leader and servant. There are those who, affecting a deep concern for democracy, would have democracy silent, submissive, grateful for such crumbs and crusts as may fall from oligarchy's table. Some of us have a better opinion of democracy than that.

I should like to believe that our system of self-government is eminently capable, when it has learned such a lesson as that of the last 5 years, of finding ways to strengthen and preserve itself. I should like to believe that we are heading toward a better and finer flowering of democracy than we have ever known. Certainly we have been an inspired democracy and a resolute one since March 1933. At the end of 15 months we are still headed toward our humane goals. I should like to believe that we can continue in that direction until our purposes are attained.

But we shall have to be vigilant. In the long run the chances always favor the Tories, and these gentry among us are now, after a period of highly appropriate silence, becoming clamorous. We need to bear in mind that the most impatient of those who today attack the Nation's recovery program are the very people and the very interests who mainly made that program necessary.

For 12 long years they led us wandering in the wilderness after gross, false gods. They brought us to the verge of bankruptcy. They turned the country over to President Roosevelt on a day when every bank in the country was closed as the result of their lack of vision, in the first instance, and of their inability to cope with the consequences, in the second.

Here was statesmanship for you! Yet these same "statesmen" are now demanding: "Where are we headed?" After all, it is a rare tribute to the ability of the President that they should expect him, within the space of little more than a year, to repair the wreck of their 12 years of misrule.

They go so far, some of them, as to say that the status quo of the Hoover administration should have been left undisturbed, thus assuring a quicker and more substantial recovery than has been brought about under the leadership of President Roosevelt. They are particularly displeased with the "brain trust." Even men on the floor of Congress, who proudly display Phi Beta Kappa keys on their expanding waistlines, seem not to want ripe judgment or expert advice in the conduct of our national affairs.

Certainly, for some years before March 4, 1933, there was little, if any, evidence of the use of brains in the national administration. As certainly, too, we are not headed back toward the catch-as-catch-can, unscientific system that prevailed then.

One of the specific criticisms of some of the steps we take in our new direction of march is that they are violative of the Constitution. This criticism is expressed so vigorously and so frequently that it will not be inappropriate to consider it here; for, after all, it is a grave criticism. It is directed, as a matter of fact, at the Supreme Court of the United States and not against the legislative or the administrative branches of the Government.

The duty of the Supreme Court is to pass upon the constitutionality of legislative acts, and that Court is alert to protect the Constitution in its essential integrity. It is absurd to argue that this country is in the slightest danger of having imposed upon it a series of unconstitutional laws so long as the Supreme Court continues to function. To argue thus is to question the wisdom or impugn the motives of the distinguished men who constitute that tribunal.

Of course, no one would be cynical enough to suggest, even in passing, that there may be an ulterior motive underlying the clamor about the violation, present or prospective, of the Constitution. No one would assume for a moment that the gentlemen who are in the forefront of this attack upon the Supreme Court are proceeding in the hope that their talk may penetrate the sanctity of the Court itself and affect the judgments of the men who compose it. No such improper motive, I am sure, could possibly motivate the actions of these gentlemen, many of them outstanding members of the bar, in their assault upon the administration.

It should not be forgotten that while the legislative and executive branches of the Government were swept by the overwhelming votes of the people into new hands in November 1932 there has been no change in the personnel of the Supreme Court. That body as it stands consists of the nine men who composed it before the coming into power of this administration. Six of the nine were, and presumably still are, members of the Republican Party. One, and perhaps two others, are Democrats.

Regardless of the party affiliations of these 9 jurists, it is a matter of record that 7 of them were appointed by Republican Presidents and the 2 who were nominated by a Democratic President had that honor conferred upon them by President Wilson. A mere statement of these facts is sufficient to meet the charge that we are in the slightest danger of breaking away from the Constitution.

A knowledge of history helps the American people to remain perfectly calm amid such uproars as the reactionaries in our midst are now beginning to raise. We remember, for example, the furor that raged around President Lincoln. In 1863 The New York World was saying: "The administration shines, like the moon, by reflected light. It borrows its ideas and its policies, so far as it has any, from these crazy radicals. By surrendering itself to their wild and reckless guidance, it is ruining the country."

Not a single word of this invective against Abraham Lincoln and his policies need be changed to serve the purpose of those who berate President Roosevelt's leadership today.

These attacks upon our courageous, experimenting progress toward a new and hopeful order of things in the United States would be amusing if they were not so ominous. A democracy contains all sorts of minds and philosophies. There is no certainty that the Tories may not prevail and take charge of our destinies once more. What will happen in this country after another of their periods of materialistic rule, with possibly another 1929 at the end of it, is not even a guess.

Meanwhile, we are headed on the course which the founders of the Nation charted. We are on our way to raise the standard of living of the great mass of the people, to equalize opportunities, and to redistribute wealth fairly and equitably. And I have faith that the great majority of the American people wish this to be our course.

RECOVERY ALTERNATIVES—ADDRESS BY SENATOR REED, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on Friday, May 11, 1934, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] delivered over the national network of the Columbia Broadcasting System a very interesting and informative speech, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECOVERY ALTERNATIVES

Every loyal American wants his country to prosper and its people to be happy. There can be no distinction in motive between those who try to achieve this goal by one method and those who seek to achieve it by another. The differences which cause political divisions, which set political parties in separate paths, and which give rise to issues which divide Americans into political groups are differences of policy, representing divergent ideas as to how best to promote the ends sought to be achieved.

It is well to bear this in mind when considering the issues which confront the country at any time, and particularly at present. I credit President Roosevelt with patriotic motives in introducing the policies of the new deal. I regret that I cannot recognize the same patriotic purpose in certain others who surround him. But regardless of motive, and regardless of what you or I or anyone else may think of some of the things which are going on in Washington, and of the policies set in motion by the President and those to whose advice he listens, we all know that in the end they will be judged by results, and not by what we think of them now. If these policies are sound, the country will know it and accord their authors the credit they will have deserved. If they are not sound, it will be equally apparent and the condemnation of public opinion will be as searching. That is as it should be under our form of government.

In the meantime, however, while these experiments are in progress, there seems to be a growing tendency on the part of their sponsors to resent criticism, to attribute it to unworthily partisan motives, and to ascribe to the critics of certain policies of the new deal a purpose to break it down for their own advantage. This sensitiveness to criticism appears to some of us to have its source in fears on the part of its authors that perhaps all is not well, after all, and that those of us who have been pointing out the dangers of these policies are perhaps right, and the policies we are criticizing are perhaps wrong. I am sure in my own mind that this is so. But be this as it may, the friends of the new deal have on many occasions recently taken refuge behind the statement that no one has a right to criticize unless he can offer an alternative.

This is like saying that if we see a man staggering down the street, obviously under the influence of too much liquor, we have no right to say he should have stayed sober, or to try to persuade him to sober up. We should offer him, instead, some other kind of stimulant, or try to persuade him to become intoxicated in some other way. I do not intend in saying this to be facetious. I say it to illustrate what seems to me to be the state of mind of the professors, the doctrinaires, and the theorists who are supplying the ideas for the new deal, and to whom President Roosevelt unfortunately is listening. They have fed the country first one stimulant and then another until it is staggering under more different kinds of bad medicine than any country could possibly absorb without serious and possibly permanent injury.

And all it needs, in my own judgment, is to quit taking these stimulants, to get out of the overheated and stifling atmosphere of the new deal, to get back to plain living, and to sober up. That, basically, is the alternative I offer for the spree which has been in progress for the past year. If by liberal applications of cold water I can assist the country toward sobriety I shall continue to throw it by the bucketful.

There are alternatives which I would offer also for particular policies of President Roosevelt. In the short time allotted to me tonight I can discuss these only in outline. I present them for two reasons: First, as a sincere expression of my own views as to the best approach to real recovery; and, second, as an answer to those defenders of the new deal who ask constantly: "What is your alternative?" This is my answer:

FARM POLICY

Instead of paying the farmer for plowing under his crops and reducing his acreage, a policy which is wasteful, sectional in benefit, and dishonest in conception, which has led to wide-spread abuses throughout those sections of the country where it is in evidence and which likewise has placed a stupendous burden on all consumers, payable in higher living costs, I would give the farmer sound money, good roads, low taxes and interest rates, accurate market reports, and the benefit of scientific research in the field of agricultural aids. Given these, I would let him alone. I would not pay him for injuring himself, as the Government is doing at present. I would not encourage him to think that the Government will somehow support him. Above all, I would not interfere with his independence or in any way take from him the freedom which makes him prefer farming to any other occupation. The spending spree calculated to help the farmer has done untold injury to all farmers except those in a few States who have received money for work they did not do. And for this we all pay.

THE N.R.A.

To the extent that the N.R.A. has raised wages, shortened working hours, and succeeded in abolishing sweatshops and child labor it deserves commendation. These gains should be made permanent. To the extent that it has permitted price fixing at the expense of the consumer, operated to nullify the antitrust laws, and injure the small merchant and the small business man—like the pants presser in New Jersey who was given a jail sentence for charging 5 cents less for pressing a suit of clothes than the National Recovery Administration thought he ought to charge—I am against it and think these policies should be discarded and the law itself repealed. In a society in which big business is slowly crowding out little business, minimum-wage laws and fair-trade laws are necessary. The small, independent business man who relies for success on his own character, energy, and intelligence must be protected and encouraged. It is from this group that the Henry Fords have come. Yet it is big business which is being helped and little business which is being injured by the policies of the N.R.A. as administered at present.

THE CURRENCY

There can be no substitute for sound money in any country which uses money. To debase the dollar once is to establish a precedent for debasing it again. If it doesn't serve to raise prices the first time, there is always the temptation to inflate the currency a second time and a third and a fourth time. Inflation is a drug. I do not want to see the United States acquire the drug habit. It is probable that we can never go back to a gold dollar of the standard we knew before the arrival of the new deal. The Federal Government during the past year has reached into the pocket of every American citizen and taken 40 cents of every dollar he possesses, no matter in what form it may be held or invested. If you or I did that as individuals, it would be called "stealing." The professors call it "reflation." Called by any name the effect is the same: you lose your 40 cents. I do not want to see that happen again. I want the currency kept sound. I want prices to remain within reasonable limits so people can buy the food and clothing they need. I am against stealing the money of the American people in the name of recovery.

CREDIT

Every day the Federal Government is going a little farther into the field of private credit, lending more and more money to people who need it, forgetting that this process is likewise a drug which could easily ruin the country. This policy has operated to dry up credit, to scare capital into leaving the United States in search of more fertile fields of investment elsewhere, and to deprive Americans of work while American capital is used to build factories abroad. But there is an even more sinister aspect of such a policy in the control it gives the Government over those who need money and must come to Washington to get it. As an illustration, we all know of the abuses which have grown up in the home loan system. In my own State of Pennsylvania the field force of the system is being rapidly replaced. The political appointees who administered these funds originally were lending money to their friends, refusing loans to political opponents, and making unsound loans on fictitious values. That is the danger of allowing politicians to control the machinery of credit. Given control of all credit, it would be possible for any government to perpetuate itself in power indefinitely. I am against that. The Federal Reserve System and the home loan system are necessary as reservoirs of credit for those engaged in the lending of money as a business. But they should not function directly in that field, except in emergency. When the emergency passes these functions should cease. I worked and voted for the law creating the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, recognizing that there existed at the time a great need for funds for home financing and that these could not be obtained from any other source. There is still a great opportunity for service in this field. But I have been disappointed in the functioning of the system in the first year of its existence. In the field of farm credit I have said many times and still believe that the system should be simplified, so that the farmer who needs a loan could come to some one central agency and get an answer to his problem without wasting weeks or months learning where to go.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

My alternative for the present policy of spending twice or three times as much as the Government receives in revenues is the old-fashioned one of living within our income. I persist in thinking that we can't spend our way to prosperity. No individual has been able to do it and no government can do it. The millions of Americans who have been on the receiving end of the $10,000,000,000 of Government money spent in the last year or two will not like it, but they must learn eventually that the process cannot continue indefinitely. One of two things will have to happen very shortly: The Budget will have to be balanced or we will find ourselves on the toboggan of inflation, starting down a slippery track to a certain crash at the bottom. It isn't too late to turn back. In another year it may be. I am for balancing the Budget now. The first lesson that every schoolboy and schoolgirl should be taught is that the American people themselves pay for the joy rides of their Government; that they are the Government, and that spending is always followed by paying the bill.

C.W.A., C.C.C., R.W.D., AND OTHER RELIEF MEASURES

A single, simple, permanent policy of work relief, based on the principle of the Civilian Conservation Corps, with military training and discipline added and work projects scrutinized more closely, should be substituted for the policy of handing out money by the millions to States, counties, cities, and individuals without adequate check on results. The idle population of the country must be supported, but those who receive relief funds from the Government must, if physically able to do so, render an equivalent service to the community for the relief received. I would exempt all women and children from the operation of this rule. I confine the work-relief policy as outlined to able-bodied men.

For the policy of hiring hundreds of press agents at public expense to put out propaganda defending the new deal, as is being done at present, I propose as an alternative that the President and his advisers tell the country the simple facts.

For shocking waste of public funds, I propose the alternative of rigid public economy, believing with Thomas Jefferson that to take one penny from the taxpayers unnecessarily is to steal that penny.

For the policy of ruling the life of the individual citizen from Washington, I would, as an alternative, restore to all Americans the sense of freedom in search of which their ancestors came to these shores. For the fantastic experiments of the past year, many of which have failed when tried by other countries and other civilizations, I propose the alternative of tested truths and common sense.

The application of these alternatives would hasten real recovery. They would set us on the road to a prosperity greater than we have ever known. The failure to apply them already is leading us in the direction of disaster.

WAR—ADDRESS BY DR. ARTHUR TALMAGE ABERNETHY

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the RECORD an address delivered by Dr. Arthur Talmage Abernethy at Rutherford College, North Carolina, on the subject of War. For the information of those who read the article I should like to have the privilege of saying that Dr. Abernathy is an educator, a lecturer, and an author of North Carolina, and has the distinction of having written 52 books.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Every fiber of my nature rebels against any unholy effort to involve the United States in war. If we are sincere in our proclamations as the spiritual leader of the countries of the earth, we will accept the preachments of the Great Peacemaker and turn our full powers to avert rather than to promote war. We claim to be a Christian nation. No Christian nation can afford to make war. War is hell, hell regnant and rejoicing, and no Christian can lend his services to promote hell. War is the triumph of the devil. It can find no justification amongst men, nor forgiveness from God.

There never was a good war nor a bad peace. War is the rule of brute force over human reason. It is the recrudescence of barbarism. War stands stripped of its mask.

What is war? Not the flying flag, martial music, throbbing drum, flashing sword, gleaming epaulets. It is God's earth guttered with graves; the silver sea stained with blood; mangled bodies; arms and legs torn off; eyes shot out; buried alive; strangling with poison gas; stumbling through life on crutches; gaunt famine stalking through gullies and chasms which were once fertile gardens, grain fields, and orchards; ashes instead of happy homes; mourning instead of music and merriment; children tugging at empty breasts, and starving to death while mothers cry their hearts out; men trampled in the red mud under the hoofs of horses.

War is the concretion of all crimes; the sublimation of all sorrows; it is the avatar of death. War is the procurer and restaurateur of the ravenous vultures that fatten on the flesh of the sons of God. It is the apotheosis of hellish greed and cruelty. It is the incarnation of hell's archruler; the coronation of the Antichrist. On his throne of human bones he sits, and out of empty skulls he quaffs the blood of men and the tears of women. His music is the staccato snapping of heartstrings, measuring the moans of orphans and the idle prayers of widows.

War is the pimp and pander of his majesty the earthworm. War is an epicure feeding only on the flower of manhood. His triumphal march is marked by the livid light of burning churches, galleries of priceless art, libraries, and happy homes. His trail is followed by famine, pestilence, and disease and death. Thirty-five times the number that live on earth have been sacrificed on his red reeking altars, and yet he calls for more.

War is the siren that maddens men and transforms them into beasts. It dethrones reason, kills conscience, and destroys all sympathy. It is the deification of murder. To this archdemon the taste of blood is as sea brine to the sailor, exciting more thirst. War is the carnival of all devils dancing on an isolated world and deriding the God who pronounced it good. War never settled any question; it never will. In its murky slime all vices are spawned; in its holocaust all virtues are consumed.

War is a hellish wizard; it subsidizes the press; fires the flannel-mouthed jingoes; suborns the poet and painter; dazzles the diplomat; subverts science; crazes the clergy; stampedes statesmen; mocks at peace parleys; and poisons public opinion.

War is a pirate; it takes its toll and tithe of all production; it grinds the poor into powdered dust to enrich the profiteers, the bond barons, munition makers, the Coffin Trust, makers of surgical instruments, glass eyes, artificial legs and arms, the Steel Trust, and the undertakers.

War is an anarchist and outlaw, laughing at all conventions, tearing all treaties into strips, and planting every peace pact with seeds of subsequent struggle. War is of the devil—and "war is hell."

RECIPROCAL-TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire briefly to supplement the observations which I submitted at some length 10 days ago respecting the pending tariff-bargaining measure.

Mr. President, I might say in this connection that it seems to me the French exhibit is somewhat significant as bearing upon one phase of the tariff controversy which we have been rather constantly emphasizing, namely, the fact that it is the considered policy of European countries to increase their rates on the threshhold of a contemplated bargain for the purpose of ultimately reducing the rates without loss in respect to the indicated commodity.

I refer again to the fact that Senate Document No. 7 of the Seventy-third Congress, first session, particularly defines and emphasizes this process under a heading which significantly reads as follows:

The padding of tariff rates in preparation for bargaining.

Mr. President, we Americans have no padding upon which we can fall when we undertake to enter the international market place and seek one of these so-called "bargains." Other countries already have provided themselves with the padding—and I am using the word sent to us by the Tariff Commission as descriptive of the process. They have their padding. We have no padding. When we fall, we fall with a dull, sickening thud upon the hard floor of reality. We have no cushion. When they fall, they fall upon the padding which they have created for this precise purpose. We shall be hurt worse than they—or we shall be protected by a veritable miracle.

If France, for example, is considering at the moment an increase of 3,300 percent in the tariff on American films, it is perfectly obvious that the padding process already in contemplation will leave us utterly at a fatal disadvantage in respect to hoping ever to break even in connection with one of these padded undertakings. We are not equipped for such combat. The pending proposal does not bring us added equipment. It merely brings us added exposure.

I call attention in the same connection to the fact that we are advised in this debate and in the promotion of this bill that the world's economy has been particularly upset by tariff barriers and other artificial obstacles to the free flow of international trade and intercourse. We are told that by now embarking upon the tariff-bargaining policy ourselves we shall facilitate the world's release from these barriers and obstacles which have interrupted the free flow of world trade and world intercourse. Yet, Mr. President, in the very document from which I have been reading—namely, Senate Document No. 7 of the Seventy-third Congress, first session, which is a letter from the Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission—the following sentence occurs:

Since 1919 there is evidence that the increase of tariff rates and the erection of barriers principally for use in bargaining—

I emphasize the phrase "principally for use in bargaining"— has grown rather than diminished. Accordingly, the difficulty of making a reciprocity treaty yield net reductions—

I emphasize the phrase "net reductions"— in foreign tariffs has increased rather than diminished as the bargaining countries have attained greater experience.

In other words, we are put upon notice by our own Tariff Commission that when we join this maelstrom of bargaining in the international market place we are not in fact contributing to any new and broadened international comity. On the contrary, we are simply following our European neighbors in the precise trends which have created the very difficulties from which we undertake to secure relief. We increase, we do not diminish, the frictions and the hurdles and the handicaps.

But, Mr. President, I rose particularly this morning, supplementing my observations of a few days ago, to call attention to one or two rather significant facts which are available in the experience of the past few days. I desire to call attention to the fact that the President of the United States on Saturday increased the protective-tariff rates on chenille-rug imports and imports of other cotton rugs. In response to the recommendation of his Tariff Commission, which had discovered by its inquiry that the cost of production in the United States in respect to these commodities required an additional import protection in order to permit them to survive against cheap foreign competition, the President on Saturday increased the tariff rates upon these rugs.

Former Governor Max O. Gardner, of North Carolina, counsel for the Cotton Textile Institute, was quoted in connection with this Presidential use of the flexible power to increase the tariff on rugs as follows:

The cotton-textile industry as a whole has been vitally interested in this case. It is the first case affecting a basic industry which has been decided by the President on the provisions of section 3 (e) of the National Industrial Recovery Act. The decision will be interpreted by the industry as showing that the President is fully conscious of the peril to American labor and American industry resulting from uncontrolled importation from countries whose standards of living are lower than ours, and whose industries operate without codes and without limitation of hours or minimum wages.

Coming at a time when tariff bargaining is in the forefront of national thought, this decision is reassuring and heartening, not only to the textile industry but to industry in general.

Mr. President, that is a very significant statement by a very distinguished Democrat from North Carolina who is intimately related to the present administration.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. The rug industry in America, as it has suffered from imports from Japan, is not unlike the china and the pottery and the match industries, which have been suffering almost since the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, as the Senator will recall.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is quite correct.

Mr. President, I desire to reemphasize what ex-Governor Gardner, of North Carolina, has said in this connection. He said, in effect, precisely what I said in my original argument against the pending bill, namely, that if the powers inherent in this bill are used, they will be directly at war with the N.R.A. and with the A.A.A. He said, in terms, that the rug decision will be interpreted by industry as showing that the President is fully conscious of the fact that American industry cannot proceed with its artificially increased cost of production under the N.R.A., that American agriculture cannot proceed under its artificially increased cost of production under the A.A.A., and successfully face foreign competition except as there is an increased measure of protection instead of a decreased measure of protection, as contemplated by the pending bill.

I think it is no misstatement of the purpose of the pending bill to say that it anticipates lower tariff rates, because I can scarcely bring my imagination to conceive of a bargain which would interest any foreign country in which we increase our tariff rates in order to please our foreign neighbor.

The President, according to his action upon Saturday, and according to the interpretation of it by Governor Gardner, acknowledges—

The peril to American labor and American industry resulting from uncontrolled importation from countries whose standards of living are lower than ours and whose industries operate without codes and without limitation of hours or minimum wages.

Governor Gardner, interpreting the action of the President upon Saturday in increasing the rate of duty upon rugs, specifically says that we cannot embark upon a lower tariff trend and hope to leave any remote opportunity even of survival for American industry under the N.R.A. and American agriculture under the A.A.A.

This tariff-bargaining bill, then, if used at all, will destroy the N.R.A. and the A.A.A. in whatever degree it is used. This bill, if not used, will create nevertheless the threat of destruction, and thus curse industry and agriculture with fatal uncertainty.

Mr. President, every economist that I have read in the past perplexing year has finally come to the conclusion that uncertainty is the major hazard and jeopardy which confront and undermine the recovery program. It seems to be universally acknowledged that if we could overtake and overcome uncertainty, if we could substitute a feeling of dependable certainty in American business, we should be well on our permanent way out of the slough of despond. I think it is well illustrated that this is the truth by the effect which our new Federal deposit insurance has had upon the banking experience and history of the country, and upon the attitude of our depositors.

Here is the one single point in the recovery program where there is definite and specific certainty. As a result, there has not been a single bank failure since New Year's Day; hoarding is almost at an end; bank balances have increased upon every hand and in every sector of the Nation. That is what happens when certainty is available to the understanding of the American people.

Governor Gardner, of North Carolina, discussing the industrial situation, reiterates the need for certainty if there is to be any constructive progress for the future. Governor Gardner says that the President's action in increasing tariff rates upon rugs, "coming at a time when tariff bargaining is in the forefront of national thought, is reassuring and heartening."

Mr. President, it can be reassuring and heartening to business as a whole only as it demonstrates that the President does not intend to use his bargaining power in the reduction of any tariffs which will invade the differential and cost of production at home and abroad. If that is what Saturday's decision means, then the decision is reassuring; but if that is what Saturday's decision means, then this tariff bargaining bill is an idle gesture, pure and simple, will never be used to any appreciable extent, and, as a result, is utterly uncompensated in respect to the threat of uncertainty which it leaves, hanging like the sword of Damocles, over the head of American business and agriculture.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUTTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I listened to the able Senator from Michigan making an allusion, a fitting illustration to his argument, to the act for the insurance of bank deposits, in which, let it be said, the able Senator from Michigan contributed his intellect and ceaseless industry, and to which other Senators on this side and on the other contributed their best efforts and reflection. The able Senator says that the certainty of that measure brought back deposits, gave more security to the deposits in the banks, and worked a complete benefit, unquestioned, because of its application. I ask the Senator, Will he please explain, if it is in his mind to do so, why, with such a splendid piece of work done in behalf of the plain people, whose deposits had been jeopardized, and to prevent the banks from any further looting of their own institutions, after this measure was enacted a group called the Investment Bankers' Association, another, a State bank establishment in Virginia, in a meeting at the Greenbrier, White Sulphur Springs, and then the American Bankers' Association, all should have passed resolutions denouncing this administration, denouncing the insurance measure, speaking of it as an element of socialism, referring to it as a failure, and as one that was unbecoming statesmanship and destructive of the confidence of business?

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is the question the Senator submits?

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the Senator, What has the Senator from Michigan to say reconciling those forms of objections from these large interests attacking this administration because the bill in which the Senator had so prominent a part was enacted?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I had not expected to detour into a discussion of the bank deposit bill, but I am very happy to respond to the Senator's inquiry.

I would not undertake to explain or palliate the attitude of such bank associations as may foolishly continue to stand in opposition to the deposit-insurance formula under which we are now operating. I remind the Senator that the great American Bankers' Association, the A.B.A., met in Chicago, his home city, last September, and passed resolutions violently attacking the entire bank-deposit theory and text.

Immediately upon hearing that news I solicited the opportunity to appear before a convention the following week in Chicago of the National and State banking commissioners of the country, and I undertook to say in that presence that I considered the attitude of the American Bankers' Association to be not only inexcusably reactionary but utterly beyond economic defense. I continue to hold to the same view. And if any banking associations today persisted in an attitude of hostility to the fundamental proposition of bank-deposit insurance on the sound basis of today's operating formula, I would join the Senator from Illinois in saying that there are none so blind as those who will not see.

Have I answered the Senator's question?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator has answered, in this respect, that he does not approve the action; but I call his attention to how they declined to see in so splendid and potent a measure certainty that business would revive. They regard the act as so uncertain as to be destructive of everything that makes for confidence in business.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, even though they may still find elements of uncertainty in it—and I am happy to say that, in my judgment, 90 percent of the bankers of the country today are in favor of the existing bank-deposit formula—even though there still is a minority of bankers who object to the bank-deposit insurance law, nevertheless, the incontrovertible fact stands plain as day that some 30,000,000 bank depositors have found complete and dependable certainty as a result of that measure, and therefore the triumph for certainty is in proportion of about 30,000,000 upon the one hand to a comparatively few thousand upon the other.

Mr. LEWIS. I concede that. I am merely inviting the attention of the able Senator—who collaborated ably in this movement—that big, bad business always assails everything this administration has tried to do to lift the fallen and to aid the masses.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to see that the masses have any stake in a reduction of American tariffs which puts these American masses at the unprotected mercy of even competition with aliens at utterly low-wage standards and on a basis of utterly low living conditions. I fail to find any parallel in the Senator's observation, because if there is one group more than another which benefits from the maintenance of the American wage scale and from the maintenance of the American standard of living, it is the group to which he refers as "the masses."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I am of the opinion that the criticism on the part of the conventions referred to by the Senator from Illinois is against the old idea of bank-deposit guaranty, not of bank-deposit insurance.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. FESS. It indicates rather a blindness on the part of leaders in banking when they confuse the thing which has been accomplished with the thing we have never attempted, and scarcely would attempt unless we were willing to have the Government go into the banking business and operate the banks.

I have been considerably disturbed over the type of opposition we hear expressed in such conventions, which seems to be to what is now being done with so many splendid results to the people, when really the opposition is against something we have never attempted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator's analysis is acute and correct.

Mr. President, let me return now to my quotation of Governor Gardner, of North Carolina, who, I repeat, finds it—and these are his words—"reassuring and heartening" to American industry in the textile trade to discover that the President upon Saturday proposed to put certain tariff rates up instead of down.

Mr. President, that brings one more American commodity to a reprieve from this pending bill. We already have been told, unofficially, that wool need not worry about the application of the tariff bargaining bill. We were told upon yesterday by the able Senator from Mississippi that he will undertake, by textual amendment to the bill, to make it plain that coal and oil and lumber and copper need not worry about the pending bill. We have Governor Gardner's testimony, as a result of Saturday's tariff decision, that this phase of the textile industry need not worry. These are life-saving exemptions vouchsafed to us—although I do not know by what rule of consistency they are selected for the immunity equally craved by others.

Mr. President, each one of these reprieves is gratefully accepted. Each one of these few reprieves reduces, by just that much, the menace and the hazard and the jeopardy which are inherent in this pending tariff-bargaining measure. Each one of these few reprieves removes, in kindred degree, the element of uncertainty which otherwise will curse American business and American agriculture and hobble it and defeat long-range planning. But I submit that it is a strange piece of legislation, brought forward in the name of recovery at the moment of critical American emergency; it is a strange formula, which can find its chief value only in the serial demonstration of the exemptions to the formula upon which the American people may rely. It is blessed solely in proportion as the country may contemplate escape from it.

There was a significant paragraph in the story in the Washington Star on Sunday, May 27, speaking of Governor Gardner's statement. I quote:

> While he did not say so, it is pointed out in other quarters that the raising of rates in this case serves to make it clear that it will be difficult from a practical standpoint for the State Department under the new tariff bill to reduce on industrial products in making trade agreements.

Mr. President, here is the suggestion upon semiauthoritative base that it is going to be difficult, if not impossible, to reduce industrial rates in order to achieve any of these contemplated tariff bargains. We already have the word of the President of the United States that it would be absurd to reduce agricultural tariffs. I quote him literally:

> It would be absurd to reduce agricultural tariffs.

So here is the amazing contemplation. On the one hand, it is next to impossible to reduce industrial tariffs; on the other hand, it would be absurd to reduce agricultural tariffs; yet for some unknown reason we must drive ahead with scarcely a word of defense from the other side of the aisle for this legislation; we must still drive ahead in contemplation of the exercise of this autocratic Presidential power in connection with the tariff.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I observed in a newspaper a few days ago what purported to be an interview with a leading official in Canada in which it was said that the Canadians would be prepared to take more automobiles if they could send some of their cattle and other products of that kind into the United States. Does the Senator think that a practical proposition?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President; but I think it is a very typical one, and I think it is precisely the type of bargain which lingers in the minds of our good foreign friends who contemplate this present legislation with great alien enthusiasm. We are going to disappoint them or we are going to wreck ourselves. Neither result is useful.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest that it might be a good exchange to permit the importation of Canadian cattle in exchange for the exportation of American corn into Canada. Canada does not raise very much corn. We can bring their cattle over here and feed them with our corn.

Mr. BORAH. It would not be very agreeable, in my judgment, to the cattlemen or the corn raisers to do that.

Mr. CLARK. It would work no real hardship on the American cattlemen and I am certain that it would be extremely agreeable to the raisers of corn, who have suffered so much for lack of market.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Be that as it may, Mr. President, no Congress would ever vote it. And that emphasizes the basic vice of this thing we are asked to do. It is the reason we are asked to do it. We are asked to sublet a congressional power which it is known in advance we would not dare directly to exercise ourselves. Therefore it simply means that we are invited to pass this bill for the purpose of circumventing what would be the contrary tariff views of the American people as reflected through the American Congress and as reflected through most of the Democratic Party itself.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. On the contrary, this bill is proposed for the purpose of giving the nations of the world an opportunity to undo the results of their own folly in a tariff-making war almost as ruinous as the competition in armaments.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Missouri was not here when I began today, because I do not want to take the time of the Senate to retrace my argument. The very thing that the Senator from Missouri says will be the happy accomplishment of this legislation is disproved by the report of the Tariff Commission made to the Senate of the United States on March 30, 1933. This report dismisses such an achievement as an impossibility in all human probability, because this report states textually that the thing in the last decade which has chiefly caused this unnatural, artificial system of international barriers abroad at heights never heretofore known—and this is not my opinion; it is the opinion of the United States Tariff Commission—the very thing that has caused it has been the creation of this tariff-bargaining process in Europe. Why? Because, according to this official report, European countries have learned that the way to bargain is to put their rates up in the hope that they can bargain them back down. If they can bargain them back down, well and good; they have not lost anything. If they cannot bargain them down, there they stand at the new artificial altitude.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In just a moment.

Therefore, I insist, upon the basis of this official exhibit, that we are not contributing to world comity in respect to trade when we enter this amazing business of trying to out-bluff our neighbors in respect to tariff deals.

I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, and I am very sorry if I have caused the Senator to repeat by coming into the Chamber after he had opened his address; but this much is certainly true, that the United States has been the aggressor in this tariff war. The other nations of the world never started this tariff bargaining business until they had been forced to it by the example set by the United States in a system of so-called "bargaining tariffs", but actually prohibitive tariffs. We are responsible for this whole system of bargaining tariffs, and we can only unravel the ball by beginning at the end where it was begun.

Mr. VANDENBERG. First, I want to assure the Senator from Missouri that I welcome his interruptions. It is such a novelty at the end of 10 days to hear an occasional voice on the Democratic side of the aisle in even casual defense of this dangerous measure, that I want to assure the Senator that I would encourage it no matter how much it might disarrange the continuity of my discussion.

Second, I think there is available proof that what the Senator says about the existing American tariffs is without warrant. It happens that the exhibit which I now submit to the Senate was the next thing in continuity that I proposed to present in defense of the thesis which I am submitting. I do not believe our American tariffs inspired Europe's tariff wars and walls. I think they started through a continental anxiety to prevent the payment of German reparations in goods, in commodities. I think they continued under the impulse of their own rivalry, as reported in the Tariff Commission document to which I have adverted. I think, further, that it is easily provable that our American tariff rates are not the exorbitant duties to which our Democratic friends love to refer—always, however, in the abstract.

Mr. President, since the 4th of March 1933 the President of the United States has had at his beck and call a United States Tariff Commission, which we are advised by its Chairman is so completely subservient, and so anxious to be completely subservient to the Executive disposition, that it would do almost anything the President might wish. I think that is no exaggeration of the accommodating Mr. O'Brien's testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee. In other words, in spite of the law which textually requires the Tariff Commission to assess its judgments according to the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, we have been advised that this Commission would find some way to make a recommendation for a lower tariff if the President would just indicate that he wanted it. Very well. Now, what has happened?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator not think it is fair to state that Mr. O'Brien was first appointed by a Republican President, and that he was supposed to be a Republican?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, I think that is true; and before that he was Grover Cleveland's secretary.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, he got away from the straight and narrow path.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Whatever he was, Mr. President, at the moment I suspect that he would even be willing to do what Professor Tugwell wants him to do if he were asked; and Professor Tugwell said the other day—I had the reference here, but it is mislaid—that there was not any rate on any industry which he did not think ought to be removed. He said no industry is entitled to support by a tariff; and he, by the way, will sit with the supergroup, which will be the President's tariff cabinet, under this bill, sitting in drumhead court martial upon the destiny of American industry and agriculture.

So here we have this Tariff Commission which has been perfectly willing to do anything that President Roosevelt wanted done in respect to lowered rates during the past 14 months.

All right; what has happened? How many rates have been lowered, Mr. President? How often has this so-called "iniquitous tariff protection" been dynamited by these new forces of economic virtue? How often during these 14 months have we had the reductions which will relieve the Nation from this exploitation to which the Senator from Missouri refers? Well, we had it once in connection with sugar, but in that instance it was offset by a compensating proposal of a processing tax, so that is not a clear indication.

Except for that one instance, the only two changes downward that have been made from this so-called "iniquitous" tariff during these 14 months, when the situation has been completely in the command of the President and his party—the only two revisions downward are on hay and manure forks. If there can be a major crisis made out of that, Senators who can do so have a better imagination than I have. And it has a significance as bearing upon the particular thing which we are discussing this morning.

Mr. FESS. The Senator ought to state in this connection that under the tariff law of 1930, of the changes made in rates on the recommendation of the Tariff Commission and the action on the part of the President, 16 percent, as I recall, were increases and 30 percent were decreases. So there were many more decreases than increases. That was under the administration prior to the present one. So the suggestion that there is no interest except in increasing the tariff is not carried out, because the major operations have involved decreases.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his correct observation.

Mr. HEBERT and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HEBERT. I observed, in reading a statement made by the Chairman of the Tariff Commission, Mr. O'Brien, before the Ways and Means Committee of the House when this measure was there under consideration, a table showing the total number and the description of the different commodities which were considered for revision upward or downward by the Tariff Commission since 1930 down to date. They are 111 in number, and of those the Tariff Commission recommended increases in 20 instances, it recommended decreases in 26 instances, and in the remaining 65 instances they left the duty just where it was.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

I again yield with great pleasure to the only Democratic Senator who has invaded this debate in about a week.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, there will be plenty of remarks on this side.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I hope the Senator is a true prophet.

Mr. CLARK. We wanted, however, to accord the fullest opportunity to our adversaries to fill up the RECORD and delay the consideration of this bill as much as they pleased. Now that we have arrived at approximately a time to vote, there will be plenty of discussion of the subject on our side of the Chamber.

I simply want to explain to my friend from Michigan that it is apparent that I did not make myself clear to him a moment ago. The point I was trying to make was that, having been the aggressor in this retaliatory tariff war, it is now impossible for the United States to correct the situation merely by reducing tariff rates. By establishing prohibitive duties ourselves, we have caused other nations to establish prohibitive duties; and, whether the duties are prohibitive or not, we cannot correct that situation merely by a reduction of rates.

Personally I would prefer to have Congress enter on a scientific revision of the tariff, not by means of a general tariff bill, affording opportunity for logrolling and for trading and for chicanery which have made the whole tariff-making system of the United States disgraceful for so many years, but a revision schedule by schedule. But even a revision schedule by schedule, in the absence of reciprocal action by other nations, would not correct the situation which we have created by our own folly, because the situation of prohibitive tariff rates which we have ourselves created cannot now be corrected by our action alone.

May I say—and I am not going to interrupt the Senator again—that so far as the findings of the Tariff Commission are concerned, I, for one, wholly refuse to be bound by them, because it has been demonstrated time and again under the Republican administration that the Tariff Commission appointed by Republican Presidents was subject to Executive control and that its findings should not be taken as a matter of course.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is the Senator opposed to tariff commissions that are under Executive control?

Mr. CLARK. I am opposed to the present Tariff Commission set-up, yes; in other words, if the Senator wants a blunt answer, I will say that I am opposed to tariff commissions under Government control.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Precisely, and the Senator stands squarely upon his own Democratic national platform when he makes that candid response. It is exactly the response I would expect from the Senator from Missouri, and his position and the position of his party platform are just 100 percent diametrically opposed to the legislation which we are now asked to swallow, willy-nilly, without even a chance to look at the Colombian Treaty, which is supposed to be a model typification of what we are asked to do.

Mr. CLARK. I disagree with the Senator that my position and the position of the Democratic national platform are in any manner opposed to the pending bill. I am perfectly willing to have a fact-finding commission to submit facts to the President for his information, and that is not in the least inconsistent with giving the President the power to bring about by negotiation what cannot be brought about in this stage of the world's competitive tariff war by legislation. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his contribution; it is refreshing to hear an occasional Democratic voice. I want to revert, before I forget it, to his repeated statement that we have been responsible by our tariff policy for what has happened in Europe; and I want to refer him again to and prayerfully ask him to please get a copy of Senate Document No. 7, of the Seventy-third Congress, first session, and read the United States Tariff Commission's unequivocal statement that ever since 1919 what has happened in the Old World is unrelated to our tariff policy but is primarily a reflection of this very bargaining back and forth, which has resulted in what is called the "padding process", one country padding its rates up in order to have something to bargain back down, and the other country padding its rates up in order to have something to bargain back down. We have padded nothing, if we accept the cost-of-production theory, which I insist is the American theory. We have padded nothing, as demonstrated by the fact that the Tariff Commission in 14 months could find only hay and manure forks as having rates greater than the actual differential in the cost of production at home and abroad. We have not been responsible for the tariff wars in Europe, according to our own Tariff Commission. As indicated in this official document, the tariff wars in Europe are the direct reflection of the precise tariff policy which we are now asked to embrace and embark upon, to wit, efforts at reciprocity bargains.

Mr. CLARK. I said I was not going to interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator need not apologize.

Mr. CLARK. But I should like to have the Senator yield for just one further remark. I have read the document to which the Senator refers, and I have read the passage to which he refers, but I refuse to be bound by a conclusion of the Hoover Tariff Commission.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, this may be the Hoover Tariff Commission, but this report is signed by the Chairman of the Hoover Tariff Commission, who made the amazing statement to the House Ways and Means Committee and to the Senate Finance Committee, in effect, that he would do anything that President Roosevelt wanted him to do.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I hope the Senator is not going to hold the Democratic Party responsible for anything that might be said by the appointees of former President Hoover.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am going to hold them responsible for the pending bill now and hereafter, and so are American business and American industry and American agriculture.

Now, let me go on with what I intended to be but a brief discussion of the inevitable deduction to be drawn from the statement of Governor Gardner in the Sunday press, descriptive and analytical of the President's action upon Saturday in increasing the tariff duty on rugs.

If the President's action upon Saturday, plus the illuminating analytical statement of it by Governor Gardner, plus the fact that the Tariff Commission in 14 months has only been able to identify two insignificant products upon which the existing tariff is too high—I say that the inevitable conclusion from that series of facts is either that tariff rates cannot be reduced in the United States and bargains thus made, or if the rates shall be reduced and bargains thus made, some American commodity, industrial or agricultural, will be deliberately destroyed.

This is the first tariff debate, Mr. President, in which anyone has dared to presume that any public official intended deliberately to destroy an American industry. I want to absolve, in my own mind, the President of the United States from wittingly engaging in any such philosophy, but I cannot immunize his tariff advisers from the direct charge that they are willing to destroy any American industry or any American agricultural commodity which in their Olympian judgments are considered inefficient or expensive, those being the two words of fatality which they use in cracking down upon their intended victims. This is the first time we have ever had a tariff debate contemplating the exercise of a power for the destruction, the deliberate destruction, of an American commodity, either industrial or agricultural. We have it literally and by text in the present instance.

When the Senate votes for this bill, Mr. President, it, therefore, votes for either one or the other of these alternatives to which I have referred; either it votes for a futility, on the theory that the power cannot be used, since rates cannot be reduced on industrial or agricultural products, or it proceeds on the theory that it is willing to have some American commodity destroyed. I submit that it is utterly untenable for us to proceed in contemplation of either theory.

Mr. President, I add, in supplement, that it is not necessary to create this new power in order to get free list bargains, which is the one point at which, it seems to me, tariff bargaining might be logical. If we are correctly informed regarding the implication of the so-called "Colombian Treaty", which this coordinate treaty-making power of the Government is denied a chance to inspect, it involves nothing more than the freezing of the free list. It was a bargain made at least 4 months before this bill was written and at least 6 months before this bill will become a law. Therefore, the administration has demonstrated for itself, under the leadership of the President, that it can deal with the free list effectually if it wants to without asking Congress for this amazing surrender of the tax and treaty power.

I repeat, it is not necessary to pass this bill in order to create a tariff-bargaining power in respect to the free list. It is not necessary to pass it in order to contemplate an increasing American export trade either, Mr. President, as demonstrated by the figures submitted by the United States Automobile Chamber of Commerce, which show that during the last quarter the automobile exports increased 100 percent, which is a fairly encouraging percentage, without any thought of bargains or any attempt to make them. To attempt export encouragements by this particular method is to invite a chance of net loss quite as much as a chance of net gain. I demonstrated this fact 10 days ago and no apologist for the bill has tried to answer.

So it seems to me that we are driven to this inevitable conclusion in contemplation of the bill. We cannot apply it to agriculture, because the President himself has said that it would be "absurd"—that is his word, not mine—"absurd" to reduce any agricultural tariff rates. So we cannot apply it to agriculture.

We cannot apply it to industry except as we would ruin industry in whatever aspect we attack it, as I have previously demonstrated by my analysis, and we dare not do that, and neither would the President dare do it when he gets this power.

Here we are, then. This power cannot be used legitimately in respect to agriculture. It cannot be used legitimately in respect to industry. It is not needed in order to deal with the free list.

Then why pass the bill? Where, then, Mr. President, is the compensation either to the American Congress or the American people? Where is the compensation, first, for multiplying utter uncertainty in the American economic world, since no industry and no agricultural commodity may know what morning it shall be marked for slaughter?

Second, where is the compensation for creating an insufferable precedent in maximum bureaucracy—secret bureaucracy most of the time—ruling the lives and livelihood of the American people?

Third, where is the compensation for consenting literally to a Fascist dictatorship in respect to tariffs, because we are advised by Italy that it is the fundamental Fascist philosophy that one-man control of the economic life of a nation is prerequisite to Fascist perpetuation?

Fourth, where is the compensation for violating the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution of the United States in respect both to the taxing power and the treaty power?

Where is the Republican compensation for deserting the fundamental theory of protection upon which three-quarters of a century of American prosperity in factory and farm has been builded?

Where is the Democratic compensation for deserting the theories and the philosophies to which that party has subscribed its faith these many years, to say nothing of its 1932 platform?

Where is the compensation, Mr. President, in conclusion, for those of our able colleagues across the aisle who now turn their backs upon the urgent and earnest appeal which they uttered to the Nation against the limited use of a limited flexing tariff power now existent, a flexing power which has been approved by the Supreme Court as constitutional and which involves no subletting of congressional power to a degree which invades the spirit and the letter of the Constitution?

Where is the compensation for their turning their own backs on their own warning to their own countrymen 4 years ago? I read in conclusion just one exhibit, the tremendous appeal signed at the time by the then Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Simmons, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], as follows, this being the peroration of their appeal to the Nation:

> In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachment in this direction and especially with respect to taxation. In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad and public view of this important public question, we make this appeal.

Mr. President, in direct paraphrase of the appeal, I address the Nation in the same hope on the same plea in behalf of the Constitution of the United States and the welfare of the American people.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, there has been so much dramatic argument on the tariff bill in the Senate during the last 2 weeks that I feel I ought to talk about the matter in a very simple way for a brief period of time. I never could understand how a man could grow eloquent over a subject as dry as taxes or the tariff. I believe that perhaps, unintentionally of course, some harm has been done to the country by the discussion on the part of some Republican Senators. They have expressed fears which I believe do not exist to any very great extent in their own minds.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I notice he uses the term as being in contradistinction, "taxes or the tariff." I am sure the Senator will agree with me that the tariff is nothing on earth except a tax, whether it goes into the Treasury of the United States or into the pocket of some tariff-protected concern.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator for making the suggestion, because I did not say what I intended to say. Of course, the tariff is a tax, the worst tax that ever has been invented by man. A protective tariff, in my judgment, is the most indefensible thing in the whole world. What I meant to say was "a discussion of taxes or the regulation of interstate commerce", which is quite a different thing.

I listened with very great interest, as I always do, to the speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. It caused me to think how small things sometimes change the very course of a man's life. There is a place in the Rocky Mountains of Canada where a stream rises some 10,000 or 15,000 feet above sea level. It started toward the Pacific Ocean as a tiny stream, but there was a little boulder in its path which diverted it and it went around through a little sink and over to the other side where it eventually reached the Atlantic Ocean. If it had not been for that little boulder there would have been a great gulch or canyon over the mountain down toward the Pacific cut by the stream. But in view of the fact that the boulder diverted the course of the stream the canyon is on the other side, toward the Atlantic.

I have thought frequently if the distinguished Senator from Ohio had continued as a teacher in some great school throughout the years instead of coming to the Congress of the United States, that instead of his becoming associated with Republican statesmen, instead of having his trend of thought diverted, I believe most sincerely that he today would be one of the leading "brain trusters" advising the President of the United States. The Senator shakes his head, as much as to say that he would not; but I remind him that he cannot tell what he might have done if he had not come under the influence of such distinguished statesmen as Uncle Joe Cannon and many others whom I might mention.

In his speech the other day the Senator spoke frequently of revolution. He read from a book or books written by Mr. Tugwell, in which the word "revolution" was actually used. Because our friends on the Republican side, and probably some on this side, have talked about revolution and have mentioned revolution so frequently in these debates, the people have become somewhat alarmed. Particularly do they become afraid when a distinguished conservative Senator like the Senator from Ohio speaks of revolution.

I should like to remind the people of the country and the Senator from Ohio that he need not apprehend any difficulty in the use of the word "revolution" as it is used by some of our modern writers on political economy and on questions of government and governmental regulations. I desire to remind the people of the country that when we go back to the Declaration of Independence itself we find that revolution is written into it as one of the inalienable rights of the people; and we have never been afraid of the Declaration of Independence. I should like again to call attention, for the RECORD, to the language of that immortal document, which, so the Supreme Court has said, is as much a part of our laws as the Constitution itself. It is a document which has been quoted by those who have discussed government more, perhaps, than any other document that has ever been written in all the world.

I should also like to remind the people of the United States, as well as the United States Senate, that the Declaration of Independence was prepared by a group of young "brain trusters" who were trying to find some new way to build a government that would protect the rights of the people; and so the idea of having experts, men who have given particular thought to particular questions, is not new in the life of our American Republic.

When Thomas Jefferson and other members of the Continental Congress conceived the idea of preparing a Declaration of Independence, it was drafted and was adopted by those men who were thinking in revolutionary terms.

Now, let us see just what rights we have, as expressed in the Declaration of Independence:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

When a people have been denied the pursuit of happiness by any government or by any law, they have been denied one of the inalienable rights guaranteed to them by the Declaration of Independence.

> That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I admire the courage of my friend from Kentucky. I wish to call his attention, however, to the fact that he is likely to be arrested for reading that very inflammatory document.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator, because, after listening to the debates on the other side of the Chamber for the past few days, one would believe that it was treason—I believe some of the speakers have used the word "treason"—to talk about changing anything in our Government that does not square itself with the ideas of those who have come to believe that Government rests with a few who should act as trustees for the whole people of the United States.

I shall not stop, however, with the reading merely of the Declaration of Independence. At that period of time in the history of the Nation men thought more clearly about political matters than they do today. It is true that they did not have so much to think about. It is true that they did not have the complex civilization which we have at the present time. When we stop to think that George Washington never saw a railroad train, never saw a steamboat, never talked over a telephone, never saw an automobile, never thought of such a thing as the radio, and a flying machine was something that it had been determined by the scientists could never be invented, we know how little the people in 1776 knew about the problems of today.

No one believes more sincerely than I that we must take the principles which they announced in those days, which seem so far in the distant past to us now, and apply them to new conditions which have arisen, because in no other way can government exist.

The right of revolution has been talked about in a book written by Roger Sherman Hoar. The name does not sound like that of a man who would be very progressive in his ideas, or very liberal in his views. I should judge that he comes from the State of Massachusetts. He had something to say on the question of revolution as it was understood in the old days; and I should like to call attention to a few things which he said in this book. He discusses the making of constitutions, and then says:

> But as the science of government became better understood, and the great doctrine of the right (not merely the power) of the people to change their government was promulgated, it was found that it was not necessary to resort to revolution in order to change or modify government, but that such changes or modifications might be made as peacefully, as orderly, and as legally as any ordinary function of government could be exercised.

He was quoting, it is true, from another author, Braxton; but he quotes with approval the language I have just read; that is, that the people can change and modify their government in a perfectly peaceful manner; that it does not require the overturning of government by riots; it does not require the overturning of governments by armies; but, so this author says "revolution"—the word which has been used by some of our modern writers—can be brought about by changing or modifying the government, and still remain within constitutional provisions.

Now I should like to quote from the same author as he quotes from the Reverend William B. Greene:

> It is not necessary—

Said Mr. Greene—

> in order that there be a revolution, that there should be bloodshed, powder burned, and other attendants of war displayed. A revolution may take place peaceably, and if the right is once recognized in a country, it should take place peaceably, because in the recognition of that right is also the recognition of the duty of obedience upon the part of the Government.

So I remind those who are so afraid of the word "revolution" when it is used in its proper sense that those who adopted the Declaration of Independence, and those who wrote the Constitution of the United States, did so with the principle always in the back of their minds that the people had the right to change or modify their Government when it was not so administered as to bring happiness to the people.

Now I desire to refer to a treatise on government by Mr. Holcombe and show what he thinks about revolution.

He quotes from someone—I do not know the author, neither does he give his name; but he quotes from someone—who wrote in the old days about American Government, and he referred to revolution as "the sacred right of revolution." He said, also:

> It is asserted in a more philosophical manner in the Massachusets Declaration of Rights of 1780.

Let me take occasion to say now that nearly every constitution that was adopted prior to 1800 contained in it a provision that the people had the right to change their government in any way that they deemed necessary to bring the blessing of happiness to the people.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to his colleague?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is not this ability and facility for changing gradually and peacefully the agencies as well as the forms of government one of the things that will ultimately prevent revolution by bloodshed; for if the people could not obtain their rights by peaceable methods they would be driven to the more forcible way of bringing it about?

Mr. LOGAN. My colleague has mentioned only that which was in the minds of the makers of our Constitution. Where there had been a government of tyranny, where there had been a government that was autocratic, there was no way for the people to change or modify the government peaceably.

Consequently, that condition led to revolution by bloodshed, and by powder and ball, as one of these writers has said. But our fathers, be it said to their great credit, and to their everlasting fame, were trying to build a government which could be changed to meet emergencies as they might arise. They were trying to adopt a constitution which would fit into every emergency, and they made ample provision for the people to change their Constitution if, perchance, some emergency should arise which had not been foreseen by them.

I should like to refer again to the book written by Mr. Holcombe when he quotes from article VII of the Constitution of Massachusetts, which was adopted in 1780:

> Government is instituted for the common good; for the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness of the people; and not for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men: Therefore the people alone have an incontestable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to institute government; and to reform, alter, or totally change the same when their protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness require it.

Mr. President, that constitution was adopted in 1780, and at that time the people knew what the fathers meant when they wrote the Declaration of Independence, and when they were getting ready to write the Constitution of the United States. The political philosophy of that day was well known.

The Constitution of Kentucky was adopted in 1792. It contained almost exactly the language which I have read from the Constitution of Massachusetts, adopted in 1780, but there was a headnote, a catch line, to that particular section, written by the constitutional convention itself, which said, "The right of revolution shall never be denied."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I do not think anybody would contest the theory that the people have the right of revolution. That is fundamental, it is elemental, and I would not think anyone who had any conception of the growth of government would deny that right. It is essential, fundamental, with us, as has been stated by the Senator from Kentucky reading from the Declaration of Independence and also from the other documents, in reference to State constitutions.

My concern is not that the people have no right to change their government, not that; I concede without a minute's discussion that they have that right. We have established a government, and, unlike any other modern government, have a constitution, which limits power and is a guide to this body, given in the letter of instructions, given to the people through the Constitution, which is the letter, and it is my belief that if there are people who talk of revolution in the United States it ought not to be those who have taken the oath of office to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution. Let the advocate of revolution proceed in orderly ways, but let any man who wants to change the Government first resign if he holds public office, and not proceed while under the obligation of his oath of office to preserve the Constitution. Let him resign and proceed to foment public opinion back of his theory of revolution, and I shall say nothing about it; but when we have men committed to the Constitution talking revolution, I draw the line.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have great respect for the great Senator from Ohio as a learned man, one familiar with all these matters which I am simply mentioning in passing; but his statement shows that the little pebble that diverted his course in his method of thinking has operated to such an extent that he really has misconstrued the inherent powers which are fundamental in all of our governmental papers which give us a national life. He suggests that a man should first resign and then say he is going to attempt to change the Government, and that the Members of the Congress ought to be the last men to mention revolution.

The Senator is in error about that. The very body that would bring about a revolution—within constitutional limits, of course—is the Congress of the United States. It is true that in the making of laws, it is true that in the exercise of the authority this body has, it may bring about such a revolution as was referred to in the Declaration of Independence; but, of course, it must be within the limits of the Constitution. We can do nothing outside of the Constitution itself. We can pass no law that will have any binding effect if it is not within the provisions of the Constitution.

When our Constitution was adopted, this body was set up to make laws to carry into effect the purposes stated and the powers granted in the Constitution. That power was vested in the Congress. It is our duty to do that. Perchance we might trespass and go beyond the limits of the Constitution; but the Constitution itself has set up a court which has the authority to determine whether we have done that or not; and so long as we have a government with a legislative body authorized to make laws and a court to determine whether or not those laws are constitutional, talk about a revolution that is not within the Constitution, of course, is foolish.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think there may be a confusion in the mind of the Senator and in my mind over the word "revolution." If the Senator means changes within the limits of the Constitution, that is not revolution, as I see it. He is speaking now about changes which must be made within the limits of the fundamental or organic law, the Constitution. I have in mind, when I talk about revolution, the definition of revolution that is accepted throughout the world, a fundamental change in political organization, or in government, or constitution, the overthrow or renunciation of one government and the substitution of another by the people. That is the accepted definition of revolution. If the change is within the confines of the Constitution, it is not revolution. I think there is a confusion in my mind and in the mind of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. Revolution in its broader sense means only change, that is all, and there can be a peaceful revolution within the Constitution which has been adopted. We can change our methods of government, we can change our methods of administering the affairs of a government within our Constitution, and I say to the Senator from Ohio that all the talk about a revolution that has frightened some of the people who do not understand these matters as well as does the Senator from Ohio, that all the things which have been said to arouse suspicion, ought to be answered by this one statement, that neither the Congress, the President of the United States, nor any bureau or department, can do anything with our constitutional government that is not in accord with the Constitution itself, and when anyone undertakes to say that we have denied the people their constitutional rights by any legislation which has been enacted, it shows that he is unfamiliar with the Government, that he is unfamiliar with the history of our Government, that he is wholly unfamiliar with our plans and theories of government.

We cannot pass a law that will take any power from the Congress, we cannot pass a law that will take any rights from the people, we cannot vest anything or take away anything unless the action is authorized by the Constitution itself. So why should we broadcast to the world from the Senate Chamber that the rights of the people are being taken away from them by legislation which is enacted by the Congress, when everyone who makes a statement of that kind must know that we can take no constitutional right away from the people, or away from anyone, nor can we vest any right that is contrary to the Constitution?

Since the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] confesses that there is a right of revolution, I will not pursue the question further, except to say that nearly every State constitution, even down to the present day, has guaranteed to the people of the State the right of revolution, in that they have a right to change their government in such manner as they may think is best; but, since the Federal Government was established by the Constitution, as is said by some of the writers, there can be no revolution in a State, because if there be any revolution it must be a revolution by or within the Federal Government.

Those things are self-evident; they are so clear that there can be no reason for anyone to place in the minds of the people of America the thought that the Congress of the United States is taking rights away from the people. That it cannot do, and every Member of the Senate knows that it cannot do a thing of that kind.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator regard the change in government in Germany as a revolution?

Mr. LOGAN. I am not sufficiently familiar with the government of Germany to be able to determine that question. If they simply changed their government without abandoning their constitution or constitutional principles, then it was a revolution within the constitution. There are revolutions by force, and there are revolutions by reason of changes or modifications made which are not in violation of the fundamental principles of existing government. There are fundamental disagreements as to what may be done under the Constitution, and when the Senator from Ohio and I disagree, then there is a tribunal established by the Constitution to determine whether he is right or I am right. If, perchance, it is determined that he is right, then what I did or what I said counts for nothing; and if it is determined that I was right, then what he may have done or said counts for nothing.

My point, let me state to the Senator from Ohio, is that there cannot be taken away from the people any right that is guaranteed to them by the Constitution, and to say that such has been done, or that such we are trying to do, or that such we will do, is unfair as an argument to be sent to the people of America to be read and to be considered by them.

I also say that it is unfair to take some book expressing some theory of government, which does no more than express the same ideas and principles of government that were expressed by Thomas Jefferson or by many others who had made a study of political philosophy, when our Government was established, and to brand the author as a Communist or with some name that means that he is a traitor to the Government, when he is doing nothing but repeating what has been said from the foundation of this Government down to the present time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have been trying to arrive at what the Senator means by a revolution within the Constitution, and I wanted a concrete example. I regard what is taking place in Italy as a complete revolution in government. I so regard also what has been done in Germany, although it was not done by means of bloodshed. And even in Germany what was executed as a coup d'etat was afterward endorsed by a vote of the people of Germany. I wondered whether the Senator in his discussion of revolution would state that he regarded either one of those two cases as being revolution? I would so regard them.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not talking about a revolution by force.

Let me give the Senator a concrete example. We are discussing it now. It is germane to the subject. For almost 100 years—for perhaps more than 100 years—Congress has been attempting to enact laws providing for a protective tariff on certain industries. That movement grew and developed until the rights of the people had been taken from them, perhaps rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution if it should be properly applied. This idea of shopping about and bargaining about to make tariff laws so that some may be made immensely rich by pilfering the pockets of the poor has become so notorious that it is a stench in the nostrils of the civilized world.

That has gone on until there are those today who believe in that theory of government, who believe it is right that we ought to make certain owners of industries rich and powerful because they will act as trustees for the people, and they will see that good wages are paid, and that the people are fed, and that the people are clothed.

That idea of government has gone so far that it has become a part of the very being of many of our old, conservative statesmen. They believe that is right, just as much as I believe it is wrong. They are entitled to their opinion. Now we are proposing to bring about a revolution in respect to that very condition.

What is the revolution? We will stop, if we can, the unfair practices which have been engaged in in the past, and we will endeavor to find a better way to protect the rights of the people. I do not know whether we are going to find it or not. I do not think that in this bill we are dealing with the tariff so much as we are dealing with something else, and I shall discuss that in a few minutes.

Personally, I know it is wrong for Congress to make rates in a tariff law. I know that Congress cannot intelligently do it. I have never been here when a tariff law was made, but I have read about it. I know a little about the tariff. It is a matter which should have been removed from politics many, many years ago. I think now that we ought to have a Tariff Commission appointed to serve 15 years or longer, which shall be entirely free from all political influence, and that it should deal with the tariff in a scientific manner so as to do that which would bring justice, insofar as possible, to a majority of all the people.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I see that the Senator's view of revolution and mine are not alike if the Senator refers to a change in the policy of tariff as a revolution. It is a revolution in policy, it is true, but that is not the type of revolution we are talking about when we are referring to the injection of certain practices that are disturbing the relationship between the executive branch and the legislative branch. Although what is done is done without bloodshed, although no force is used when we change the very character of our institutions of government, I call that revolution. But when we speak of a change in policy such as a change in the tariff we are referring to a revolution in policy only. I think we are confused in what we refer to when we talk of revolution.

I cannot believe that the Senator would differ from my own views in that regard. My view is that even though it be done in a perfectly peaceful manner, if gradually the proper relationship between the coordinate departments of the Government is undermined, and ultimately one department is made the major or the prime governmental force in American life, that is a change in the very organic life of our Government, and I would count that in a sense a revolution, although it is not a bloody revolution, and no force is used in accomplishing the purpose. That is what I had in mind when we were speaking about the change in Italy and the change in Germany. I am concerned about such revolution.

Mr. LOGAN. May I ask the Senator if he thinks there can be such a thing as a revolution unless there is a violation of constitutional rights?

Mr. FESS. When I use the word "revolution" I mean a violation of the organic law and not action in pursuance of it. The former would be a revolution in government in our country.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, if it be a violation of our organic law, does not every citizen in the United States have a plain and adequate remedy to protect himself against such violation of the Constitution through the courts?

Mr. FESS. So long as the Constitution holds; but when the revolution goes to the point of a breakdown of the Constitution the courts go with it.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator in speaking the other day reached the point where he maintained that our courts were about to break down, that citizens would have no place to go, and if we passed laws which were unconstitutional there would be no relief the people could secure against our unlawful acts. Was that the idea of the Senator?

Mr. FESS. The only guarantee we have in this country is the guaranty written by the people in the Constitution of the United States. If the Constitution of the United States is broken down the guaranty is gone.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator point out to me at this time a single law that has been passed by the Congress, or a single bill now pending, which takes away a single constitutional right from the people?

Mr. FESS. Yes; the power given to an individual to tax the people is a violation of the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. If that is a violation of the Constitution, then we have taken no right away so long as we have a court to determine that we cannot do such. Is not that true?

Mr. FESS. Provided the courts do not go along with the break-down of the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, if the court goes along, we have no other body to interpret the Constitution except the court, and the Constitution is what the court says it is. Is not that true?

Mr. FESS. And then you will have the full fruition of complete revolution, where everything is gone; and the decision in the Minnesota case leads many of us to think that the Supreme Court drifts along with the current.
